This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

POSTAGE.

The Duke of Richmond, Lord Portman, Lord Brougham, and Lord Teynham presented petitions for the reduction of the rate of, — of clergy, gentry, merchants, tradesmen, and others of Ballinrobe: of the mayor, aldermen, and burgesses of Higham Ferrers: of students of the University of Edinburgh: of the committee of the Institution for the Diffusion of Knowledge, Preston: of members of the Belfast Mechanics' Institute, Belfast: of members of the council of the Phrenological Society, Preston: of the Incorporation of Skinners, Glasgow; of the Incorporation of Cordiners, Glasgow: of inhabitants of Frome; Cirencester; Bath; Northampton; Tattingstone; Shelf; Rixton; Hammersmith; Llanbrynmair; Cemmes and Darowen; Donington; Market Harborough; Newburgh; and Bruton: of the Devizes Literary and Scientific Institution: and of representatives of several societies, Liverpool. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Also, similar petitions of the Westminster Reform Society; and of the inhabitants of Hammersmith, in vestry assembled. — Read, and ordered to be received as the petitions of the chairmen, who, only, have signed them.

ARCHBISHOP OF TUAM.

LORD TEYNHAM. — I beg to state, with respect to the reverend gentleman, on whom a Noble Lord opposite, last night, animadverted, that that individual, I am convinced, had no intention of breaking the law when he signed his name as "Archbishop of Tuam." There is no man less likely to do anything wilfully, that could have any tendency to break the law, than that distinguished individual.

LORD WHARNCLIFFE. — I stated the fact on the authority of an extract from a newspaper which was on the same side of the question, in politics, as the individual alluded to; and I still persist that, if he did sign his name in this way, it was the duty of the Government to interfere.

THE PRESS IN MALTA.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I beg to state that what I advanced, on a former occasion, by way of conjecture, has now turned out to be true, — namely, that the Noble Lord the late, and the Noble Lord the present, Secretary for the Colonies, have relied too much upon the statements of a Mr. Mitrovich, a petitioner to this House, who is described as an agent of the people of Malta, and who represented, in his petition, that the Maltese were quite satisfied with the present state of the press, and prayed that the ordinances might not be revoked. I said, at the time, that I suspected Mitrovich had no right to make these statements, — that he was not an accredited agent of the people of Malta, — and that he had no more authority from them than I had, nor so much. I now hold in my hand two newspapers from Malta, in which they disclaim Mitrovich, and say that they have had nothing to do with him. The papers, moreover, are full of the debate in your Lordships' House; and one of them contains a very long argument against the ordinances, and in support of my arguments. I never knew anything of the kind more atrocious, than that this gentleman should pass as the agent of the people of Malta, without having a shadow of authority from them.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — I never mentioned the name of this person as agent for Malta; I said that I had received a letter from Mitrovich, but I never spoke of him as an agent. As to the reception of the ordinances in Malta, I have this day received despatches from the Governor, and he gives a very different account of the matter from that which appears in the newspapers referred to by the Noble and Learned Lord.

Digitized by Google

LORD BROUGHAM. — There can be no doubt that the Governor will give his own opinion of the ordinances; the Maltese journals will give theirs; and the result will show whether the Governor or the Maltese themselves most truly describe their own feelings.

CANADA.

LORD LYNDHURST. — I understand that a committee of the House of Assembly of Upper Canada, and also of the Legislative Council, have made a Report to the Noble Earl who lately held the office of Lord High Commissioner. I wish to know whether the Noble Marquess at the head of the Colonial Department will have any objection to lay a copy of it on the table?

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.— I do not anticipate that there will be any objection. The Noble and Learned Lord will, perhaps, move for a copy to-morrow.

LORD LYNDHURST. — I understand, also, that the Legislative Council of Upper Canada have come to certain resolutions respecting the union of the two provinces, and have declared that they are decidedly opposed to the measure of union, except upon certain specific terms. Will the Noble Marquess have any objection to lay a copy of those resolutions on the table?

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.— I shall certainly have no objection. I will just remind the Noble Lord how the case stands. The Legislative Council have negatived the proposition of the union; but the House of Assembly have passed the resolutions to which the Noble Lord alludes, and have attached to them the conditions of which he speaks.

CHURCH DISCIPLINE BILL.

The LORD CHANCELLOR. — I rise for the purpose of moving the committal of the Church Discipline Bill. Your Lordships may recollect that, at the close of last Session, a Bill, similar in principle to the present measure, was brought under your notice. It was read a second time; and I believe, on the third reading, some opposition being raised on the suggestion of a Most Reverend Prelate, the Bill was withdrawn for the time. I mention this fact, lest it may be supposed that your Lordships are now called upon to give your assent to a measure which you, on a former occasion, rejected. I should be glad if the interval of time that has passed since last July had removed the opposition then manifested to the principle of this Bill; but as I have no reason to suppose this to be the case, — but, on the contrary, every reason to suppose it is not so, — it is my duty to explain to your Lordships the evils which it is proposed to remedy, and the nature of the remedies to be applied. In detailing the present state of the law, I shall be guided by a document which must be considered, for the present purpose, as of the highest possible authority, — the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners of 1832. That commission was comprised of a considerable number of bishops, and of judges, or eminent lawyers who afterwards became judges. There were, therefore, as many ecclesiastical and legal authorities on that commission as could well be selected to investigate a question of this nature. They were naturally led to inquire into the present state of the law with respect to the power of enforcing church discipline, — that is, correcting the errors and crimes occasionally committed by members of the clergy. They state in their Report, very clearly and very fully, the history of the law on the subject. In the early part of British history, during the first establishment of Popery, they show that unlimited powers were given to the bishops over their clergy. In those times, the bishop was at liberty to call on any clergyman, who was supposed to have committed an offence, to clear himself by an oath, and through the agency of compurgators; and if the bishop were not satisfied with the result of the investigation, he possessed the largest possible powers of removing or suspending the clergyman. In the reign of Henry VII., an Act passed, which gave unlimited power to the bishop, at least over the benefices possessed by the clergy. He was authorised to exercise jurisdiction, in his own person and of his own right, over all who might be within the diocese. Such was the state of the law up to the period of the Reformation. At that epoch great changes were made in this respect, as in all others; and, by a statute of Henry VIII. against heresy, it was declared that "it standeth not with the right order of justice or equity that any person should be convicted and put to the loss of his life, good name, or goods, unless it be by due accusation, by witnesses, or by presentment, or confession, or process." The right to call on a clergyman to discharge himself of any imputed offence by oath was taken away by that statute. I will read another passage from the Report, which will at once show your Lordships what changes were made at the Reformation, and what the state of the law has been from that period down to the present:—

> In the beginning of the next century, Bishop Gibson was desirous of reviving, in the diocese of London, the summary mode of proceeding against clergymen, especially in cases of non-residents; but the persons claimed a hearing, and asserted the right of defending themselves according to the rules and practice of ecclesiastical courts, and it was ultimately found impossible to resist that demand. Proceedings against clergymen for ecclesiastical offences have accordingly, in modern practice, been uniformly conducted by the same rules and proceedings as are observed in other cases in civil jury courts.

This extract, considering who were the members of the commission, leaves no doubt of the state of the law at present. The statute of Henry VIII. has never been actually in force since the Reformation, but it still remains the law of the land. It is as yet on the statute book, and being unrepealed, must be held to be law, but not for the purpose of being put in force; for if that were attempted, the necessity for its repeal would become immediately manifest. One object of the present Bill is to repeal this statute. If such be the state of the law, and if proceedings against clergymen must be commenced, as beyond all question they must be, not at the discretion of the bishop, but by suits in the ecclesiastical courts, I would ask your Lordships to look at the state of those courts, and then say whether the law can remain as it now stands. The report furnishes me with the means of showing your Lordships the condition of those courts. I speak not of the courts of the archbishop, or of the diocesan courts of the bishops, which are sufficiently well known; but perhaps your Lordships may not be aware that, besides those superior courts, nearly 300 other ecclesiastical courts are in existence. It is not to be supposed that all these have a jurisdiction for trying criminal offences of clergymen. One great misfortune is, that nobody knows which court has jurisdiction, and which has not; it is impossible for the parties to discover in which court they should institute proceedings. A great object of this Bill is to take away from all the ecclesiastical courts, except those of the archbishops, the power of trying such offences; for that they are totally unfit and incompetent to be trusted with such a duty, I apprehend, no one can doubt. In some of them the judges are not lawyers; many of them are presided over by deputies, at a salary of 10*l.* 10*s.* per annum, — men of no experience or learning; and yet the inquiries instituted before them may involve, not merely the fortunes and worldly interests of clergymen, but their names and characters. The average number of the causes that come before these courts in a year, does not give more than one half cause to each court, so that there is no opportunity of obtaining the advantage of experience and practice; and at the same time, from the multitude of the modes of appeal that exist, there are caused the greatest delay, expense, and vexation. I am sure your Lordships will be somewhat surprised, when I tell you that in one instance, where a clergyman was prosecuted by his diocesan for a grave offence, the litigation lasted five years, and the bishop was put to an expense of 1500*l.* If such be the abuses of this jurisdiction, the question is, what remedy ought to be applied to them? The commissioners, looking to the whole character of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction, recommended that the smaller courts should be abolished, and all their business conducted in the courts of the archbishops. In 1836 a Bill was introduced into this House, founded on the recommendations of the commissioners, though not adopting all of them. According to that Bill, the bishop was to be the head of the court, and was to be assisted by an assessor, who would be, practically, the judge; and there was also to be a jury of clergymen to try the offence, and deliver a verdict upon it. Your Lordships approved of that measure, which passed through this House without opposition; but, as the clergy were opposed to it, a great cry against it rose up in the country, and the Bill made no progress in the other House of Parliament. That was in 1836. In 1837, I was anxious to obtain the concurrence of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, before I introduced another measure on the subject. The Session, however, passed over, and nothing was done in it upon this matter. In 1838, the present plan, or at least a plan very similar to it, was introduced into Parliament, and with the concurrence of the archbishops. I certainly cannot say that it met with the unanimous support of the Right Reverend bench, but it met with very general approbation from the members of it. The plan, however, was subsequently withdrawn. I now bring it forward again with some slight alterations. Formerly, the appeal was to the court of the archbishop now it is to the Court of Arches, which is always presided over by a learned judge, and which has always the benefit of the presence of a learned bar.

It has been said that there is a spirit in the Bill which evinces a strong tendency to interfere with the jurisdiction of the bishops. Now, if this Bill did take any jurisdiction from the bishops,—which I will hereafter show that it does not,—it would only be doing that directly by a tribunal in London, which is already done indirectly by a tribunal in the country. I call upon your Lordships to consider how the law, on this subject, now stands. You cannot take any jurisdiction from the bishops in this respect, because they have no jurisdiction in it at present, for there are various processes by which all suits of this nature are, even now, taken from the bishops' jurisdiction. First of all, the judge of the inferior court can send the suit, by "letters of request," up to the Court of Arches. Next, either party to the suit may apply for these letters of request,—and when once applied for, they cannot be refused. Furthermore, if either of them appeal to the Court of Arches, on an interlocutory decree relating to a point comparatively immaterial, the whole suit must be transferred from the bishop's court to the Court of Arches, who may keep it before them as long as they please. Any party, therefore, has the means at present of taking his suit to the Court of Arches, but at a great expense,—which this Bill will, for the future, spare him. As far, then, as the bishops' courts are affected, this Act only gives the power of doing, directly, that which is already done, indirectly. I likewise deny that any additional expense will be incurred by suitors, in consequence of this Bill; for even at present, all the important business of the bishops' courts is transacted, and all the important papers and documents are drawn up, in London, and afterwards are sent down to the different courts in the country, to be there decided upon by the different judges. The questions tried in these courts may involve questions of facts. Now, it is proposed by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, in their Report, that in such cases the parties and witnesses shall be examined vivâ voce. That proposition would require the attendance of the witnesses at the places where the courts sit. But though it is necessary to the interests of justice that there should be this power of examining witnesses vivâ voce in all cases, there are many instances in which it is not requisite to exercise that power. The Bill, therefore, provides that certain cases, according to the course now pursued in the Court of Review in Bankruptcy, shall be tried upon affidavit; but it also provides that in other cases, the witnesses shall be examined vivâ voce, and the issue of facts be tried by the judges as they proceed on their different circuits. The Bill has the merit, therefore, of providing means for saving the suitors' expense, and for obtaining a satisfactory trial of facts. Now, if your Lordships are all convinced that something ought to be done on this subject, and that speedily, the only question is, whether you will give your support to the measure recommended in the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, or to the measure which I have just introduced to your notice? I have stated the reasons why I think my own is the better plan, and I hope that your Lordships will give it your sanction and approbation.

The ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY.—As the Noble and Learned Lord has explained the nature of the present Bill in its legal bearings, I do not feel myself called upon to follow him in a track in which I am greatly his inferior; but, from the situation which I hold, from the share I have taken in this subject, and from the objections which have been urged against the present measure, it would not be consistent with the respect which I owe this House, with my duty to the country, and with justice to myself, if I did not now offer a few words. Of the importance of this subject there can be no doubt whatever. I have heard much of the necessity and of the justice of passing, for the sake both of the church and of religion, some measure by which there should be a more speedy mode provided of punishing those clergymen who injure the church, either by gross violations of morality, or by the neglect of their duties in other respects. If there be a coercive power to punish them, it is quite clear that there must be a tribunal to exercise that power,—and that, too, a vigorous and effective tribunal. We all know the regret expressed by the bishops for the duties they are unable to perform; and all of them agree that there is ground for complaint against, and that the country suffers much from, the present state of our ecclesiastical tribunals. The cry of the public on that subject is universal, and must be attended to. The delays which occur in those tribunals are excessive, and tend to discourage all prosecutions for gross offences against the church; and yet, now, when an attempt has been made to remedy and improve the condition of those courts, I have been accused, as a member of the commission, of a grave offence against the church, for having joined in that attempt.

Digitized by Google

I have heard, with great surprise, the language which a Right Reverend Prelate has deemed it consistent with his duty as a Christian pastor to use upon the subject. The Right Reverend Prelate has said that he should consider himself a traitor to the church if he were to agree to such a measure as the present. Now, the natural inference from that language is, that all who support this Bill are either traitors to the church, or labouring under great imbecility or perversion of mind.

But, now, as regards the Bill itself. The sentence of deprivation may be pronounced by the bishop in person, but still it is to be considered the sentence of the judge who presided at the trial. It is only to give additional assurance to the public that the bishop approves of the essence of the sentence, — that Lord Stowell considers the bishop's residence necessary. The bishops have, therefore, acted very properly and wisely in transferring the power to others; for it can hardly be exercised more inconveniently than by the bishop in person. But is it a power in daily use? It appears that, within the five years preceding the commission, there were only fifteen prosecutions, excluding the province of York, in twenty-two dioceses. Surely that cannot be an essential power which is so rarely exercised. It is also an inefficient, troublesome, and expensive power. In many cases, the expense is almost ruinous to both parties. I may say that this power, which is hardly alive, which shows no signs of life, cannot be a very important one. Everybody knows its inefficiency. What, then, is the remedy which ought to be applied? After what has been stated by the Noble and Learned Lord on the woolsack, I think your Lordships will agree with me that the Bill of 1836 would not supply the best remedy: at the same time that measure was recommended by the commissioners, and brought forward at a time when, in consequence of the case of Dr. Freer, the cry was so loud and general as to the necessity of something being done. But I must say, that calling upon the clergy to sit as a jury upon their fellow clergy, is an extremely objectionable course, and cannot but be extremely hurtful to the feelings of all so employed. Now, with respect to the Bill before your Lordships, I beg to state that, in my views respecting it, I find myself supported not only by the authority of that learned and eminent individual, Dr. Lushington, but by the authority of many others whose opinions well deserve the serious attention, and are well entitled to the respect, of this House. Amongst the number is that of Chief Justice Tindal. Moreover, I have consulted every one of my Right Reverend and Learned Brethren now in London, and they have, all of them, expressed their approbation of the measure. It occasions me no small regret, to find that some of my Right Reverend Brethren in this House entertain different sentiments, with reference to this Bill, from those which I am bound conscientiously to express. I regret that these differences should unhappily exist; I think they had much better have been settled amongst themselves than in public debate. Several petitions have been laid upon the table of your Lordships' House, and several letters have been published in the newspapers, taking notice of and discussing the merits of the measure. It has been opposed, also, and that very strenuously, by the Right Reverend Prelate (the Bishop of Exeter) now sitting at the table. Is it to be supposed, that so resisted, that so assailed, by a man of his ability and eloquence, it can escape from other adversaries, incited by his example, though not capable of imitating the force of his opposition? Is it to be supposed that a Right Reverend Prelate — possessing the talents and influence which he possesses — presiding for so many years as he has presided over the see of Exeter — cannot command as many petitions as he thinks proper from the clergy of that diocese? The Right Reverend Prelate (the Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol) published a letter ——

A RIGHT REVEREND PRELATE. — No! He did not publish the letter.

The ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY. — If he did not publish, it is understood that he wrote, a letter to the archdeacon of his diocese, in which he expressed sentiments decidedly adverse to the present measure. That Right Reverend Prelate can likewise command as many petitions, in his diocese, as the Right Reverend Prelate at the table can in the diocese of Exeter. Now, admitting that the petitions from those dioceses do really express the sentiments of the clergy residing in them, I will take the liberty of saying, that this fact proves nothing with regard to the opinions of the great body of the clergy throughout the United Kingdom; for, if I be informed correctly, there are no petitions against the measure from any other quarter.

A RIGHT REVEREND PRELATE. — No, no!

The ARCHBISHOP of CANTER-

BURY. — Well, there may, perhaps, have been a few other petitions sent in; but I believe that their number is very inconsiderable. I hold in my hand a statement prepared upon the subject, which was at least considered and drawn up at a seat of learning; it was considered and prepared by men of undoubted erudition, and great respectability and high station in the church, — men well versed in ecclesiastical history, and well acquainted with the ancient state of the law. One portion of their publication calls the attention of the clergy to the Bill, and the other gives the form of a petition, which it urges upon the clergy to sign, in order to expose and defeat the object of the measure; and I must say, that if the parties who have affixed their names to the petitions which have been this evening presented against this Bill, are not better informed than their learned brethren of Oxford, upon the subject on which they address the House, their statements are entitled to very little weight. One point against which the petitioners from Oxford protest is, their being made amenable to any tribunal but that of their own diocesan; and especially to their being brought before a lay tribunal, — namely, the Privy Council. Now, upon this point I am very willing to consult the wish of these parties, by introducing a clause, providing that whenever the case of a clergyman comes before the Privy Council, one or more of the bench of bishops shall be summoned to attend. It is alleged, as a great innovation and hardship, that the effect of this Bill will be to remove the last appeal away from the church, and thereby destroy the independence of the church: but how very ridiculous is this objection, when it is known that the last appeal has, for the last nine years, been always in the Privy Council; so that, if the independence of the church is in question, it has been destroyed nine years ago. There cannot be a greater error than to suppose that the Bill which I stand here to support is one by which the clerical jurisdiction can be destroyed. Complaints have been urged against the hardship apprehended from the present measure. I, on the contrary, do believe that it will, so far from being productive of any hardship, tend to much less mischief than the present system; for it will put an end to the evils of informers, — at least, it will cause a considerable diminution in the evils which informers occasion; and therefore I trust that there is no ground for the statement set forth in the petitions now on your Lordships' table, that the Bill is calculated to effect the destruction of the church. I need scarcely observe that I, at all events, am not likely to bring forward or support any measure calculated to destroy the church; on the contrary, I hope that I shall be, ever, a most earnest opponent of any thing of the sort. The present measure is supported by me, because, so far from destroying, I do think it calculated, in a very high degree, to prevent the destruction of the church. Upon these grounds I urge your Lordships to agree to the measure; entertaining, as I do, the strongest conviction that the petitions which come before you on this matter are full of misstatements, — though certainly I am quite ready to admit that those misstatements are made without any disposition, on the part of the petitioners, to deceive the House, or to practise deception on any party. I give the petitioners credit for every disposition to support the church; but it will be for the House to judge of the weight due to their allegations, and to judge, also, of the wisdom, or the justice, or the expediency, of complying with the prayers of individuals, however respectable, who betray so much ignorance of the real facts of the question on which they petition.

The BISHOP of EXETER. — It affords me some satisfaction to observe the fair and candid manner in which the Most Reverend Prelate, who has last spoken, has expressed his opinions in favour of the measure now before your Lordships. In one respect I enjoy some advantage, now, as compared with the position in which I stood when it became, on a former occasion, my duty to oppose the Bill. I have now the advantage of having heard the grounds upon which the Noble and Learned Lord and the Most Reverend Prelate support the measure. Formerly, when it was before the House, nothing was said in its recommendation. On that ground I have no longer any cause of complaint. I, at present, make no complaint; but, in my own defence, I feel bound to vindicate the opinion which I conscientiously entertain, — namely, that this Bill is one pregnant with the utmost mischief to the interests of the church; and, entertaining that opinion, I feel, now, as I formerly felt, that I should be a traitor to that church if I hesitated frankly and unreservedly to give expression to that opinion. I charge no man with being a traitor; and it astonishes me that any one should, for a moment, suppose that I meant to convey the slightest imputation of that sort upon any individual. On the contrary, I have on all occasions particularly guarded against its being supposed that I intended anything in the least approaching to it. As to the course pursued by the Most Reverend Prelate, it has been marked by perfect fairness, by a most kindly spirit, governed by an entire regard to justice; but to suppose that, because I said that, in certain supposed circumstances, I, myself, should be acting traitorously, it is therefore to be inferred that I meant to impute treason to others; to suppose this, I repeat, is one of the wildest misconceptions I have ever known — one of the grossest misrepresentations that can [illegible] imagined, of language used by me twelve months ago. I never gave the least intimation — I never thought or dreamed — of imputing evil intentions to any one; and acknowledging, as I readily do, that the intentions of others are good, I request that I may receive credit, at least, for honesty. I am bound to yield to the Most Reverend Prelate due obedience, but I am not prepared to admit his infallibility; and holding him to be fallible, I venture to affirm that, upon this occasion, he is greatly deceived. I therefore must, and will, express my sentiments in reference to the present Bill, though they may differ from those entertained by the Most Reverend Prelate who has just addressed the House. Some things that were said respecting the merits of the measure have surprised me considerably. The Most Reverend Prelate contends that the present system is excellent —advancing, in proof of that assertion, the fact of the paucity of the trials of the clergy for misconduct. This circumstance affords us just grounds for rejoicing at the good working of the system, at least so far as the character of the clergy is concerned. I therefore will say, that if such prove to be the practical operation of the system, I feel astonished that principles should now be sacrificed to remove so little of practical evil. It further astonished me to find the Most Reverend Prelate saying that that would be fatal to the church, which I recommended in a Report, and a Report to which my own signature stood first. It is evident that many hold sentiments in common with me; and nothing can be clearer than that, if I be right, the doctrine of those who oppose me cannot, at the same time, be right also. I never wish to discuss theological questions in this House, unless when it becomes absolutely necessary to do so. Here, however, is a question essentially theological. The question is, whether or not the apostolical jurisdiction of bishops would be destroyed by this Bill, if it were passed into a law? In my opinion it would be. I am afraid, therefore, that I cannot follow the example of the Most Reverend Prelate in abstaining, altogether, from the consideration of that question. Your Lordships must allow that I must feel most deeply and anxiously on the subject, when I believe that there is an almost absolute certainty of my being left in a small minority upon it; and I can assure your Lordships that it is to me a matter of very great regret that I should be compelled to think that the view I take of this measure is the right one. I rejoice to hear the Most Reverend Prelate raise his voice on this occasion, because it is always a matter of gratification to me to listen to the opinions of any of the Right Reverend Prelates upon subjects of such deep importance to the Church of England as I conceive this to be. But I will now turn to the Right Reverend Prelates, and ask them whether they do not believe that bishops have, by divine right, a jurisdiction over their clergy? I venture to hope, in putting that question, that I shall receive the ordinary indication of assent commonly given to a truism. It is painful to me that it should seem to be doubted.

The ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY. — No one can doubt it.

The BISHOP of EXETER. — I rejoice to hear the Right Reverend Prelate say, that no one can doubt it. If, then, there be an episcopal jurisdiction, by divine right, I suppose that that episcopal jurisdiction must be exercised; and if it must be exercised, it ought to be exercised by those to whom it is given. That, I should think, is a truism almost as readily to be assented to, as the other; and though there is no intimation to that effect, I will take silence for concurrence, in this instance. I will go one step further, and ask what is the form in which that jurisdiction is given, and in which it is received, at the time of the consecration of bishops? I will be as brief as possible, but your Lordships will see the importance of referring to it. In the form of consecrating archbishops and bishops, one of the first prayers is, that "they may diligently preach the word of God, and duly administer the godly discipline thereof." The service does not end there. There are some parts of it which are too solemn, even with the view of strengthening my own argument in a sacred cause, for me to venture to cite here. There is a question, however, of a very serious character, which is put by the archbishop at the time of consecration, to which I will advert, — namely, "Such as be unquiet, disobedient, and criminous within your diocese, will you correct and punish, according to such authority as you have by God's word, and as to you shall be committed by the ordinances of this realm?" Answer:—"I will so do, by the help of God." That was the question which the Most Reverend Prelate put to me, solemnly and seriously; and that was the answer which I sincerely gave to it. It may be supposed, at first sight, that the authority to be committed by the ordinance of this realm limits the authority to be given by God's word; but I am sure my Right Reverend Brethren will not say so. I am sure they will say that they are two distinct authorities;—that the authority given by God's word is one, and that given by the law of the land another. The service does not end there. The archbishop, towards the conclusion of the ceremony, delivers to the bishop a Bible, saying, "Give heed unto reading, exhortation, and doctrine. Think upon the things contained in this book. Be so merciful that ye be not too remiss; so minister discipline that you forget not mercy." That was the solemn charge which I received from the Most Reverend Prelate. I received it with reverence; I have endeavoured to practise it; I shall always consider it my duty to endeavour to practise it: but say that I feel a necessity for, or can yield to, the fancied expediency of suppressing altogether the exercise of episcopal jurisdiction, I never will, until I shall be also prepared to say, "I feel that the service of which I have just spoken is no better than a solemn mockery." If it is to be declared that it is high time to put an end to episcopal jurisdiction, I assure your Lordships that I shall deem it my duty also to declare that it is high time to request that a convocation may be called together for the purpose of devising some mode of introducing persons under the name of bishops (if the name of bishop is to be continued on the bench), in accordance with that change in the exercise of those duties which are now required of them. Even that is not all. When priests are ordained, they are solemnly asked by the bishop, "Will you reverently obey your ordinary and other chief ministers, unto whom is committed the charge and government over you, following with a glad mind and will their godly admonitions, and submitting yourselves to their godly judgments?" Here is a recognition, on the part of those who are to answer, of the jurisdiction of the bishops over them. What is the answer? "I will do so, the Lord being my helper." It is a mockery, therefore, to contend that there is to be no exercise of episcopal jurisdiction. But we are to be told that the state of things is completely altered since this form of ordination was first appointed. That must be contended, otherwise I do not understand what use there is in persisting in it. I will, therefore, turn to something else. Ours is not only the church that has to pronounce an opinion, or to act upon the opinion,—of the necessity of episcopal jurisdiction over the clergy. During 300 years, the Christian Church was not mixed up with any state whatever; there were no coercive tribunals; no support was given to that church by the temporal laws of the countries in which it flourished. But was episcopal jurisdiction not exercised in those days? So far from it,—that jurisdiction was then exercised with a degree of vigour which has rarely been seen to be exercised since. Perhaps I may be permitted to read a very few lines from one of our best Christian antiquaries on this subject. Although they are already well known to my Right Reverend Friends, who do not need to be reminded of them, I am sure your Lordships will pardon me for quoting them on the present occasion. The words I allude to are from Bingham's Antiquities.

> Bishops always retained to themselves the power of calling presbyters to an account, and censuring them for their miscarriages in the discharge of their office. Nothing can be more sure and evident than that in Cyprian's time all bishops were invested with the power of censuring delinquents among the clergy.

Cyprian's time was before that age of the Roman empire when it declared in favour of the church—a time when the church had no support from the temporal powers. Well, if it have a jurisdiction, how is that jurisdiction to be exercised? Is it to be exercised by a judicial process? There are but two ways,—either arbitrarily, or by that process which common equity, common justice, and the analogy of every judicial proceeding point out. Witnesses must be called; the accused must have notice of the charge, and the opportunity of answering it: in short, there must be a judicial process. So it was in the early church; and so it is essential it should always be in the exercise of judicial, and likewise of episcopal, jurisdiction. It is to be remarked, that not only did the early church—not only did the Church of England, in former periods—recognise episcopal jurisdiction as coming from God, but the state also repeatedly recognised it. It recognised it every time it gave force and sanction to the church itself. It was recognised by King Henry VIII. and King Edward VI., even in those instruments in which one could least expect to have found such a recognition, if it had not been extorted by the certainty of the truth of what it stated. In the early period of the Reformation, the bishops did submit to take the whole of their bishopricks by licence from the Crown; and that licence, while it enumerated all the acts of episcopal jurisdiction, stated that they were given over and above the jurisdiction given by the word of God. King Edward VI., when Cranmer received a licence from his archbishop, and to the terms of which he was willing to adhere, made the same admission. Where the church has not the advantage of connection with the state, there, also, is episcopal jurisdiction acknowledged and acted upon. If the American Episcopal Church, without the slightest assistance from the state, beyond that given to all other professions, to every other species of belief, — if the Episcopal Church of America exercise that jurisdiction by judicial process, it is plain that, in the nature of things, there is nothing whatever to prevent it from being still executed even here. Surely the circumstance of our church being protected by the state ought not to prevent it. What, let me ask, is the meaning of "protection given by the state?" — of the state avowing its belief in the religious opinions of one body of Christians, and of its acceptance of that body as the church of Christ? Is it not that, by acknowledging them as that church, they (the state) acknowledge it to be their duty to carry into effect all the essential points of the discipline of that church; and that all that is essential to episcopacy, the state, by recognising, recognises at the same time its own duty? Therefore do I say, that when a state recognises the Christian Church as its own, it, consequently, recognises the bishops of that church; and this being so, it becomes the duty of the state to give to episcopal jurisdiction such sanction — such civil sanction — as shall insure the effective exercise of it. I am willing to spare your Lordships' time and my own, by declining to go into the proofs which might be adduced from the writings of our predecessors, by stating at once, that almost every distinguished divine who has ever written upon this subject is of that opinion. I will, however, refer to what has been said by one of them, — and I could produce a dozen such authorities, — namely, by Bishop Hall; one, I repeat, of our own predecessors, a most distinguished and illustrious divine; one of the most able supporters the church ever had, and in times more pregnant with danger to the church than even the present. It was in such times that Bishop Hall thus maintained that episcopal jurisdiction was that jurisdiction which was to be exercised at all times and under all circumstances. "It is the charge, upon Titus iii. 10.: "A man that is a heretic, after the first and second admonition, reject."

So, then, it is to Titus it belongs to proceed against erroneous teachers, to judge of heresy, to give formal admonition to the heretic, to cast him out of the church upon his obstinacy. Can any man suppose it to be for a mere presbyter to make such a judicial process against heretics, to eject them out of the church? What is spiritual jurisdiction, if power to do this be not? To sum up all, therefore, it is no other than our present episcopal power, that by the blessed Apostle is committed to Timothy and Titus: and that, with so clear evidence, that, for my part, I do not more fully believe there were such men than that they had such power and these warrants to execute it.

Your Lordships will see that Bishop Hall spoke of the necessity of that which this Bill says should no longer be. He made use of the very phrase, "judicial process." In a clause at the end of the Bill it is stated (the preceding section having deprived bishops of every right to convene criminal clergymen, and bring them to judgment), "that nothing in this Act contained shall be construed to affect any authority over the clergy of their respective provinces or dioceses which the archbishops or bishops of England and Wales may now, according to law, exercise personally, and without judicial process." But that judicial process is absolutely essential. It was so in the opinions of Bishop Hall, Bishop Jewell, Archbishop Cranmer, and others; which opinions I will not weary the House by repeating. I declare, most solemnly, to your Lordships, that I cannot find a single instance of any eminent divine who has written on the subject, who does not express the same sentiments; and I hope that such Members of your Lordships' House as shall follow me in this discussion, and particularly such of the Right Reverend Prelates as shall do so, and who may wish to show that I am wrong in thinking that this Bill has a tendency to extinguish episcopal authority, will be of the same opinion as those high authorities I have just named. We are told that the "judicial process" is not extinct — that it is given to the Court of Arches. Perhaps I may be also told that it is a judicial process to the bishops, inasmuch as that the dean of the Court of Arches is the representative of the Archbishop of Canterbury. All I say is, that the dean of the Court of Arches has no such commission from the Archbishop of Canterbury. All the dean of that court holds from the Archbishop of Canterbury is — the appellate jurisdiction; and the appellate jurisdiction recognises, instead of extinguishing, the original jurisdiction of the other bishops. If this Bill pass, the jurisdiction will be held, not from the Archbishop of Canterbury, but from the state. If that be permitted to take place, then will I say that a very strong and serious mischief — a mischief which it will be more easy to lament than to remedy — will arise; then will I say that a lay power will be the only authority for the exercise of the whole episcopal jurisdiction of England, because it will be exercised only by the dean of the Court of Arches, who will hold his authority solely and simply from an Act of Parliament. We shall then, indeed, be brought to that state which the Roman Catholics are anxious to represent us as being in, — namely, an Act of Parliament church; and we certainly shall be very near it. As far as I can conceive this part of the subject, the exercise of episcopal jurisdiction will be given to the Court of Arches by an Act of Parliament, and an Act of Parliament only. It may be said that the archbishop can issue a new commission, if this Bill should pass, giving to the dean of the Court of Arches the same authority as the Act of Parliament, and that then the dean would hold the authority from the Archbishop of Canterbury as well as from the Act of Parliament. But the Most Reverend Prelate can only give that which he has; and, with very great respect for him, who, I am sure, will agree with me, I must say that he has not that authority to give. I am sure that the Most Reverend Prelate will admit that he has not any right to such a power, himself; and that, not having it himself, he will not claim the right of conferring it on others. The Archbishop of Canterbury has no original jurisdiction in any other than his own diocese. I will here take leave to refer to a pamphlet from the pen of Dr. Nicholl, Vicar General of the archbishoprick of Canterbury — a pamphlet very temperately written, containing notes upon the Church Discipline Bill, directly addressed to me, and in which the author has also done me the honour to refer to a printed speech of mine. That speech I have never seen; I know not, therefore, how far it may be correct; some parts of it, judging from what the pamphlet quotes, are not correct, although what is quoted on this subject is. The pamphlet justly surmises, that in the opinions there expressed I quoted from the authority of Gibson. I did so — in his character of legate of the Pope. That was my assertion. Besides, after having taken the authority of Gibson, I did that which I am in the habit of doing to satisfy myself that I am right, — I referred to books which enabled me to trace what the real facts were, and what the law upon those facts was. I hold in my hand the Reports of Lord Hobart, a most learned and able judge of the reign of King James I.; and the case to which I wish to call attention, is one in which an officer of the Archbishop of Canterbury, after having been restrained by the statute of Henry VIII. from calling up persons from another diocese into the diocese of Canterbury, thought fit to establish a court in the borough of Southwark, in order to call up persons from the remotest parts of the diocese of Winchester. The case was tried in the Court of Common Pleas, and this was the judgment:—

> And it hath heretofore been held in this court, that the supposed concurrent jurisdiction that the archbishop is supposed to have in the inferior diocese was not as he was archbishop, but as he was legatus natus of the Pope; for the Archbishop of York neither hath nor claimeth any such; and then that power is ceased, being abrogated with the Pope, and the late practice, if any hath been, is but an usurpation; and if it is permitted to be in the archbishop's mere power, he may erect a court of audience in every diocese, and call all causes from other ordinaries.

Your Lordships will therefore see that Lord Hobart confirms my statement, that that jurisdiction had its origin in the Pope, and that the claim of the archbishop to a concurrent jurisdiction is nothing more than a renovation of a popish claim; and that if any person should claim that concurrent jurisdiction, he would claim nothing more than what is a remnant of popery, while it is contrary to the law of the land. I feel convinced that the Most Reverend Prelate will not claim, at present, any such jurisdiction; but, in the pamphlet to which I have alluded, the archbishop's Vicar General claims it for him. There is only one way in which, upon church principles, the Archbishop of Canterbury can have the jurisdiction which the Bill proposes to give him; and that is, by making the whole of England into one diocese, — that of Canterbury, — and by making all the other bishops suffragans, not in the best sense of the word, but in the sense in which the term was employed in the reign of Henry VIII., according to which the suffragans had only to confirm the acts of the bishop. That is the only way in which, upon church principles, the Vicar General of the Archbishop of Canterbury, or any one claiming authority under him, can have the jurisdiction proposed to be given by this Bill. But even that is not sufficient for all the purposes of the Bill; the Bill is not satisfied with giving over to the Archbishop of Canterbury the whole of his own diocese, but it gives him that of York also; so that not only must England form one diocese, but it must likewise form only one province. I admit that Parliament has the power of making these alterations; I admit the right of the state to appoint the measures and boundaries of dioceses and provinces; but such alterations must be made in order to give the Archbishop of Canterbury the jurisdiction sought to be conferred by this Bill upon the Court of Arches. It is very remarkable that a whole diocese — that of Sodor and Man — is exempted from the operation of this measure. The reason of this exemption is, it is hardly necessary to say, that individuals may not be obliged to travel so great a distance as that from the Isle of Man to London. I rejoice at the candour which is shown in making this exception; and it tempts me to hope that, if I can prove that certain other clauses of the Bill will lead to very great inconveniences, my Right Reverend Friends will exhibit the same candour in assenting to other departures from the general principle of the measure. I admit that they will go to destroy still further the analogy of its provisions; but I hope to show that they are absolutely necessary. It is the third clause of the Bill which is the most important. By that clause the power of passing sentence of excommunication, suspension, deprivation, deposition, and degradation, or pronouncing any other spiritual censure, is given exclusively to the Court of Arches. I will pass over the irregularity of spiritual censures issuing from a lay court; but, by the 122d canon, the power of depriving is to be exercised only by the bishop. The pamphlet to which I have referred states that it is a great mistake to suppose that that canon prevents the Court of Arches from having jurisdiction in such a case, and affirms the right of the Court of Arches to deprive in spite of the canon. But the pamphlet cites no authority more modern than 140 or 150 years ago. Now, there has been a case of more recent date upon the point, — a case which was decided in the year 1822, — I mean that of Saunders v. Davies, which is reported in the first volume of Addams's Reports, page 291., and came before the court by letters of request from the chancellor of the diocese of Oxford, — a cause of office promoted by a parishioner against the curate of the augmented cure of Ascott, for immorality and irregularity in the performance of divine offices. The charges being established, the sentence prayed was deprivation; but the court said that, in spite of what had been urged to the contrary, deprivation was a penalty which it was not at its option to award, — deprivation and deposition being specially reserved by the canon to the diocesan. The court said, "It would be extremely unwilling to do in the teeth of that canon what the canon itself seemed framed to exclude, upon the mere dicta of counsel, in the absence of any, or, at most, upon the strength of one (blind) precedent." Who pronounced that decision? Who was the court? A great name, and one which I can never cease to respect. It was Sir John Nicholl who gave this opinion; and, in giving it, he pronounced that the principle on which this Bill is founded is wholly untenable. Suppose, however, that Sir John Nicholl is wrong, and that his son, the author of the pamphlet, is right, — still there is another claim which even the Vicar General does not venture to make, but which is set up by this Bill. The Bill actually purports to give to a lay tribunal the power of deposing and degrading; in other words, of destroying the ministerial character of the offending clerk. This is a power which the House has no right to dispose of. Neither her Majesty, with the advice and consent of the Lords spiritual and temporal, and Commons, in Parliament assembled, nor all the Kings and Queens and Parliaments in the world, ever had, or can have, the power of doing what this Bill presumptuously says the Court of Arches shall have authority to do. The utmost conceivable human power cannot confer upon a lay tribunal the right of stripping the ministers of the church of Christ of their ministerial office. The supreme civil authority in a state may forbid any clergyman to exercise his functions in any part of the dominions belonging to the state; but it cannot rob him of his ministerial office, — it cannot make him cease to be a clergyman; that power, from the very nature of its origin, can only be exercised by the bishops themselves. I look towards my Right Reverend Friends upon the bench, and I call upon them to say whether any lay tribunal can possess this power? I should be sorry to think that my Right Reverend Friends could give any answer but one to my appeal.

If, then, the Legislature cannot confer

the power of deprivation, deposition, and degradation upon a lay tribunal, some court there must be in which this power should exist; and this court, whether it be called a consistory court, or by any other name, — for that is of small consequence, — must be presided over by a bishop. It might as well be said that the power of ordaining could be given to laymen; the authority required to confer the ministerial character can be no greater than that which is required to take it away. Therefore, the Bill might, with quite as much right, enact that the power of ordination should belong to the Court of Arches. That, however, it could not do; a bishop, and a bishop only, can ordain a layman to the ministry. The maxim of the canon law goes further; it says "facilius spiritualia construuntur quam destruuntur;" and, accordingly, the canon law of England requires the concurrence of a certain number of bishops in order to depose a clerk. Even at this day, the bishop is assisted by some clergyman of his diocese when he pronounces the sentence of deposition. The learned Vicar General, indeed, lays it down in his pamphlet that, in pronouncing this sentence, the bishop only acts as the mouthpiece of the court. But he reads over the depositions of the witnesses, and acts upon his own opinion when he concurs in the judgment pronounced by the chancellor. I believe that the learned Vicar General will not find many of the Right Reverend Prelates upon the bench disposed to act as mouthpieces. They may be called upon to act merely in that capacity; but the learned vicar-general will be like Owen Glendower, who boasted that he could "call spirits from the vasty deep;" he will discover that they will not answer to his call. The state, by adopting the established church, has taken upon itself the duty of giving effect to its ordinances; it may vary or modify them in circumstantials, but all essentials it is bound to maintain and uphold. This duty is recognised by the Legislature, itself, in its most solemn enactment, — that which prescribes the form of the coronation oath. What will be the state of the church, if this measure be carried? Its legislative power is gone already. The clergy never meet in convocation for the purpose of legislating upon the affairs of the church; all legislation is now carried on by the state. And I must say that, whatever evils may have arisen from the clergy sitting in a convocation or synod, there are also great evils from the other and more modern practice; and that those evils, if legislative measures like the present are to be enacted, are incalculably greater than those which can possibly arise from the scandal produced by the squabbles of convocation. The passing of this Bill, then, I cannot help repeating, — for I have given my reasons for the opinion which I hold, — will be, in my eyes, the extinction of the true episcopal character of the church. Legislative power it has none; its judicial authority will go with the present Bill; and of its executive functions, the highest and best — that of administering justice with mercy — is no longer to be intrusted to its bishops. The church is stripped both of her judicial and her executive power by this Bill. Suppose that the proposition were, that the independent functions of the Church of Scotland should be interfered with; would not the whole of Scotland rise, in arms, against it? and would not the union with Scotland be speedily found to be a mere parchment union? If the interference were attempted with the Quakers, the proverbial peaceableness of that body would, I imagine, become a very formidable ingredient in the struggle, in the present state of the country. The Church of England is the only body in the land which can be assailed in its essential and vital parts with impunity. Entertaining these sentiments, I have felt it to be my duty frankly to avow them.

With regard to the subject of church discipline, generally, I have already intimated that I should be disposed to adopt the recommendation contained in the Report of 1832, with reference to increasing the powers of the bishops. To increase, and not to circumscribe, those powers, is the proposition of my Most Reverend Friend upon this occasion; and to the Report I find affixed the names of Charles James London, Christopher Bethell Bangor, as, also, that of another Right Reverend Prelate, who, I deeply regret, is not now present at our councils, — I allude to the name of William Dunelm. If that excellent man were still spared to us, cheering us with his presence, and giving strength and confidence to all the friends of the church, he would have, unquestionably, so addressed your Lordships that this Bill never would have been entertained. I cordially concur with the recommendation of the commissioners of 1832. The great object of those commissioners, as stated in their Report, is "to maintain and enforce the authority and control of the bishops over the clergy," — of the decline of which they give the history, and the restoration of which they state as one great recommendation of their plan.

"They would restore to the bishops that personal jurisdiction which they originally exercised, and which was afterwards delegated by them" (for never, before this Bill, did Parliament undertake to transfer it) "to their chancellor and officials." . . . . . "The doctrine of the canon law is, that although the trial of causes of certain descriptions (i. e. matrimonial, &c.) may be properly intrusted to a lay judge, to the bishop himself belong inquisitio, correctio, punitio excessuum, seu amotio à beneficio. Agreeably to this principle, the power of deprivation is reserved by our canons to the bishop in person; and the same principle seems to apply to the case of suspension, and to the infliction of any other censure which may affect a clergyman's spiritual functions." I do not approve of fettering the bishops with assessors. Depend on it, the bishop will always know what is best to be done pro re natâ, — whether to call to his aid the advice of a lawyer, or of an experienced clergyman. The law of the church is, that the bishop shall have some of his presbytery with him. The dean and chapter already present a body which ought to be ready at his call upon all occasions. There is one other suggestion which I would offer, — namely, that there be only one appeal. This may be startling to some of your Lordships; but it is my decided opinion that the only appeal from the Episcopal Court should be to the Court of Arches, and to no other tribunal. It may be said that to the Queen, as head of the church, ought to lie the ultimate resort. This, however, has not been the practice of the constitution. The Statute of Appeals, which I look upon as a most extraordinary specimen, not only of wisdom but of eloquence (I allude to the 24th of Henry VIII. c. 12.), gives a most accurate description of the constitution of England, and claims for the spirituality of England the power of deciding in all cases spiritual, and for the temporality the same power in all cases temporal. This statute enacts, that there shall be no appeal in spirituals from the archbishop's court. The cause of a different course being adopted in the following year is well known. The bishops of that time were strongly suspected of entertaining a very amicable feeling towards the Pope; therefore an appeal was given to his Majesty; and, in the dernier resort, the power was vested in the Crown of trying appeals. This power was to be delegated by the Crown to a commission. How did this work? Till late in the seventeenth century, no temporal peer or judge of the land, except in one instance, was included in the commission. My authority is not a light one; it is that of Mr. Gibson. The judges always put forward in the last resort consisted of bishops and divines. Of what does this judicial tribunal now consist? Of bishops or divines? — No. Of churchmen? — No. Of the twelve officers who are now named, it is not necessary that more than two shall be churchmen! All the rest may be the bitterest enemies of the church, — Roman Catholics or Unitarians. The only excepted cases are those of the Lord High Chancellor, and the Judge of the Prerogative Court. Does not common sense exclaim against this? The effect of vesting in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council the last resort in spiritual cases, is to constitute them ecclesiastical judges. So that the arrangement is one which, in the event of Roman Catholics being appointed judges, would directly clash with the Act of 1829. Without trespassing farther on your Lordships' attention, I beg to move "That the Bill be committed this day six months."

The BISHOP of LONDON. — It will not be possible, within the compass of a few observations (and with more than a few I can hardly think of trespassing on your Lordships), to say all that it would be desirable to state in answer to the very able speech of the Right Reverend Prelate who has just sat down. That Right Reverend Prelate has called upon me and two of my Right Reverend Brethren to give some account of the change of system which we concurred in and recommended for adoption in the Report of 1832. I certainly entertained, at that time, a notion very similar to the opinion now expressed by my Right Reverend Brother, that the early powers of the bishops should be restored to them; and I still think it of very great importance that those powers should be augmented, — but not exactly in the manner stated by my Right Reverend Brother. The experience of the years which have elapsed since the year to which the Right Reverend Prelate has referred, has led me to doubt the expediency of that specific enlargement of existing powers which was pointed out in the Report. My Right Reverend Brother has appealed to the authority of one of the most prudent and amiable prelates who ever adorned the Episcopal bench of England, — I allude to the late Bishop of Durham. Although that Right Reverend Prelate signed the Report generally, he withheld his assent from that particular recommendation. He said it would be imposing a burden on the bishops, which he shrank from inflicting on them. The law of these cases is very complicated, and depends so much on a great variety of precedents, that for my own part it would be matter of the deepest concern to me to have my attention drawn away, from matters of far higher moment, to decisions upon questions relating to mere points of ecclesiastical law. One of the most important recommendations of this Bill is, that which removes all these cases from tribunals that are mostly incompetent, and always liable to the suspicion of partiality, to a judge deeply versed in ecclesiastical law, and far above all suspicion of unfair bias. This of itself is so great a recommendation, that I should be disposed, upon this ground, to adopt the present measure, if I believed it to be free from the objections which have been stated by my Right Reverend Brother. Those objections are of a very important character, and I do not say that this measure is altogether free from them. It is quite true that, according to strict ecclesiastical practice, spiritual authority should be reserved, either to the bishops, or to the persons specially authorised by them. This is not, however, now-a-days, practicable; and, as your Lordships must make a choice of evils, I think the adoption of the present measure would involve the least. It is my opinion that the Right Reverend Prelate has unintentionally confounded the different kinds of jurisdiction which belong to the episcopal office. I agree with him, that that which is strictly of a spiritual nature ought not to be delegated to others. He alluded, for instance, to the power of ordaining and confirming; but, when you come to the power of inflicting punishment, the case is different. There two kinds of ecclesiastical punishment. You may proceed to inflict punishment on a clerk, or other member of the church, as spiritual censors. That is a power which may be held to be incommunicable, and yet it for ages has been delegated to the judges appointed by the bishops. Execution is a sentence passed in open court by the ecclesiastical judge.

The BISHOP of EXETER. — The greater excommunication is reserved to the bishop.

The BISHOP of LONDON. — However, two jurisdictions are, even now, intrusted to the hands of laymen; and to show that even this power is not, necessarily, incommunicably inherent in bishops, it is executed by other bodies, such as deans and chapters and courts of peculiars. My Right Reverend Friend, in the course of his speech, expressed a sentiment which I should have been glad had he repressed, for the sake of the effect it may produce out of doors. My Right Reverend Friend said that, if this Bill should pass, it would go a long way to sanction the statement which was frequently in the mouths of Roman Catholics, that the Church of England was an Act of Parliament Church. Would not, however, the same cry be urged, and the same objection, in point of principle, apply, to any measure that even my Right Reverend Friend might introduce, — to any remedy he might think it right to apply to existing evils? I think it is one of the peculiar doctrines of the English church that it assigns the supreme head of the church to the temporal Sovereign; and whatever may be the difference among divines, as stated by my Right Reverend Friend, that is the doctrine of those who are looked to as authorities on questions of the church in connection with the state. Those authorities hold that, with respect to jurisdictions affecting the rights of persons, the Crown is the fountain of all authority, ecclesiastical and civil. Such are the views of the greatest lawyers of this country upon a matter in which the opinions of lawyers are at least equivalent to those of the most learned divines. Even Hale, who, though a most illustrious judge, was, I must say, rather prejudiced against the ecclesiastical courts of the country, speaks of the jurisdiction exercised by the bishops as being derived from the Crown; and he declares "that all courts, ecclesiastical or civil, hold no other power or authority but such as are derived from "the King's Most Excellent Majesty."

Again, Bishop Gibson observes that the external administration of spiritual discipline, such as the removal from benefices, is in the bishops; but that it is impossible for them to exercise that discipline without the aid of those courts which derive their authority from the state. This is a measure to enforce the performance of duties by the clergy. Now, I never heard, in the English Church, that no temporal power might not interpose for that object. In 1545 a Christian King wrote that the bishops and priests must execute their duties faithfully; and that, if not, they should be punished by force of law. Is there, then, any real objection to the principle that lay authority may be admitted in aid of ecclesiastical discipline? And then arises the question, — which is the best mode of enabling the bishops to exercise that discipline which they cannot exercise without the authority of the state? I entirely concur with the Most Reverend Prelate (the Archbishop of Canterbury), that this Bill will strengthen that truly spiritual discipline which every bishop possesses, and which no one wishes to take from them. The discipline of the church is best secured, on the one hand, by a paternal exercise on the part of the bishops of the authority vested in them; and, on the other hand, by the opinions entertained by the clergy of that spiritual authority, and by their conscientious regard of the obligations they are under by the ceremony of ordination. At his consecration a bishop is solemnly charged to administer discipline according to the will of God, and the law of the realm. Here, then, are two kinds of discipline, — a spiritual discipline according to the will of God, and not exercised by the law of the realm further than the recognition, by the law, of the authority of the particular bishop of each diocese; and another kind of discipline, to be exercised according to the laws of the land. This distinction furnishes an answer to the argument which my Right Reverend Friend has drawn from the service of consecration. Then, by the ordination service, the party admitted promises to obey the chief governor, to whom the authority is committed. I apprehend that my Right Reverend Friend will not, now, insist on the power of personal excommunication as an effective means of administering the discipline of the church. Sorry should I be to see any individual clergyman taking upon himself that most dangerous power, which has been so often abused by the clergy of other churches. I think it is a proof of the wisdom of the Protestant Reformers, that they did not deem it necessary to have that power, but left the case to be judged of by a competent tribunal, after due inquiry and investigation into the merits of the case; and the 65th canon requires that the sentence shall be pronounced in open court.

Now, with regard to the transfer of the jurisdiction from the bishops to the Arches Court; if I could devise or see any other plan for the more effectual discipline of the church, that would steer clear of the difficulty which that transfer presents, I would gladly embrace it. That part of the measure is, however, important rather in principle than in practice; but, although important in principle, it is not likely to be drawn into an inconvenient precedent. In practice, your Lordships have heard that fifteen cases in five years form the sum total of suits against criminous clergymen from all the dioceses in the kingdom; and I am sure, if this Bill were passed, the number would be further diminished, — diminished, not only because the body of clergy of the present day are more highly educated than formerly was the case, and therefore, I need scarcely add, are a more decorous and better conducted class of men; but because the knowledge that such a tribunal as that now proposed exists — that the mode of trial is summary, just, impartial, and not very expensive — that facilities of proceeding are given, not to common informers, but to the bishops, — these circumstances, all being known, would deter many criminous clergymen from persisting in any wrong course. It would deter them, for this further reason; — they would know that the bishop has the power to send for a clergyman to speak to him in a friendly but firm tone; to say to him he has too much reason, after inquiry in his neighbourhood, to believe that what he has heard respecting the conduct of that clergyman is true: to such a man the bishop could say, "There is a mode of bringing you to justice, and if convicted, you will be ruined; let me persuade you to submit at once to my judgment, which shall be as light as circumstances will admit, and retire from your benefice altogether, or at least for a time." In practice, this is now a common mode of proceeding to which bishops have recourse, and it might again be resorted to with still better effect if the Bill should pass into a law. I hope your Lordships will remember that this measure is recommended by ecclesiastical law commissioners, and that if the principle contended for by my Right Reverend Friend be carried into effect, all this preliminary discipline will be put a stop to. With regard to the delegation of powers to laymen, to which my Right Reverend Friend objects, there is no innovation of principle in this Bill, for the same thing has been done in the Act of Parliament which constitutes the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council a tribunal in such matters in lieu of the Court of Delegates. The difficulty which presents itself to my mind is involved in the transfer of the ecclesiastical causes from the courts of the bishops to that of the archbishop. That proposition certainly weighs heavily on my mind, and I wish some other mode could be devised for getting over it; but, on the whole, I cannot say, of a measure which is likely to effect great good to the church with so little of evil as is contained in this Bill, — that I will not accept it with its evils and benefits, such as they are, — thinking, as

I do, the balance is greatly in favour of the latter. I concur with my Right Reverend Friend in the opinion he has expressed that the word "degradation" ought not to be introduced into the Bill. In no case ought degradation to take place: a clergyman may be deprived of the power to exercise his spiritual functions; but I doubt whether either the state or any ecclesiastical tribunal is competent to deprive him of his holy orders, when once admitted to them. I therefore think the word "degradation" ought to be omitted. There are many other points on which I would gladly have touched, but the time warns me that I have already trespassed on your Lordships too long. I admit the difficulties of the question; but, thinking the Bill less objectionable than advantageous, and that it may receive some modifications in committee, I am disposed to adopt it in its present stage.

LORD WYNFORD.—Having served in committee on this Bill with the Right Reverend Prelate who has just addressed the House, I beg to offer a very few observations to your Lordships. My objections to this measure are of a nature, and founded on considerations, more familiar to my mind than those which have been so ably expressed by the Most Reverend Prelate and the two Right Reverend Prelates, who necessarily look upon this subject with a view to the spiritual questions involved in it. As to the subject of the assessors, several plans were brought forward in the committee, which, after much deliberation, were thoroughly discussed. My own proposal was, that the deans and chapters should act, in this capacity, in the bishop's court; but the Right Reverend Prelates thought that would not do. Now, it is the fact, my Lords, that, from the earliest period, though the bishops have delegated all other powers, their criminal jurisdiction over their clerks they have ever reserved to themselves,—merely calling in a legal adviser or assessor in cases of difficulty. An Act of Parliament, passed in the reign of Henry VII., confirmed this jurisdiction to them, and most wisely; for who so competent as the bishop, who is constantly watching over his clergy, to sit as judge of their offences? In my opinion this jurisdiction ought to be transferred to no layman whatsoever. I remember a case which occurred some time back, and will probably, also, be in the recollection of the Most Reverend Prelate, in which I was called upon to sit as assessor to a Right Reverend Prelate, upon a clerk who was charged with adultery, the object of the suit being the revocation of his licence to his curacy. Here was a grave inquiry of a criminal nature against a curate; and by whom was it heard? Not by any court,—that could not be,—but by the bishop. This was an advantage for the clerk. But why should the crimes of a rector be decided in one way, and the crimes of a curate in another way? For such is now the case. There ought not to be two methods of trial: questions, by the decision of which a curate might be ruined, ought not, I contend, to be decided in a different way from that adopted in the case of all other clerks. My opinion is, that the Bill retains all the mischiefs which are attributed to the present law; still I do not say that no alteration should be made in the present law. The expenses of proceedings under it ought certainly to be diminished. I remember a Right Reverend Prelate having been put, on one occasion, to an enormous expense in pursuing a criminal clerk to justice. The old constitutional method is, I am convinced, the only one which could be made available for this purpose,—I mean, the trial before the bishop, in foro domestico. This would prevent all the heavy expenses of pleadings in the ecclesiastical court. The Right Reverend Prelate, who spoke last, seems to think that much delay will be got rid of by this measure, and he talks of getting through a trial in a few months. But what is really done, as to this point, by the Bill? Only one appeal is saved—that from the bishops' courts to the archbishops' courts. But how do other provisions of the Bill make up for this saving? The appeal, at present, will lie from the archbishops' courts to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. But, under this Bill, the cause will go, in the first place, into the archbishop's court; from the archbishop's court an appeal lies to the Privy Council; and there the appeal will end. But when the cause gets into the archbishop's court, there it will be heard on depositions taken by commissioners, previously sent into as many parts of the diocese, and to as many other places as there happen to be witnesses living who know anything of the case. Besides the delay thus occasioned, the expense of these commissions will be exceedingly great. Nor is this all; for, after all these commissions, the judge of the ecclesiastical court may hear the matter over again, on vivâ voce evidence, by witnesses brought up from Cornwall for instance, or the most distant places of the kingdom. Still this is not all; for the judge may order an issue to be tried before any going judge of assize; and here, if any evidence should not appear on the judge's notes which ought to have been there, or any other mistake occurs, a new trial may be had. Will any one tell me that this Bill will be less expensive, or cause less delay, than the present system? Again, the person who institutes proceedings will be liable to taxed costs at least, and to whole costs if he be not fortunate. He will be liable, also, to enter into recognisances to discharge any damages which the judge may assess, who is likely to become a promoter under this Bill. In fact, I am quite satisfied that the measure will fall a dead letter, unless the bishops choose to become promoters, as they frequently have become under the present law, — much to their honour. But, however this may be, unless promoters are to be found, there is an end of the Bill. There is another point. At present, a clergyman can only be tried in his own diocese, — and this, not merely by the regulations of the church, but by an Act of Henry VIII.; this limitation, however, is to be done away with by the Bill. Now, I think this would operate most unjustly and oppressively. There are many cases in which the clergy would submit to any terms, almost, rather than enter upon a dispute with a promoter in another diocese, if such should be found to setthe Bill in motion. For these reasons I must declare I cannot concur in the measure.

The BISHOP of GLOUCESTER and BRISTOL. — Having been pointedly alluded to, and even mentioned by name, in the course of this debate, I feel it impossible to give a silent vote on this occasion. Three years ago, my Lords, I followed the Most Reverend Prelate in supporting a Bill of a very different character from that which is at present before your Lordships; but I certainly am not able to follow him in the change of opinion manifested by his support of the present Bill. I was not in the House, or in town, when this measure was, last year, discussed by your Lordships; but I have seen it stated that the Most Reverend Prelate then said that the former measure was generally disliked among the clergy, from their repugnance to sit in judgment upon their brethren. In this there must, I think, be some mistake; for I wrote to the archdeacons of my diocese, desiring them to ascertain, as well as they could, the real sentiments of the clergy on this matter; but without, myself, intimating my own opinion, or saying anything which could bias a single individual; and it turned out that the clergy were unanimous in condemning the present measure. The Most Reverend Prelate says that this letter of mine has been printed in some newspaper: if such be the fact, I can only say that it was done without my sanction or knowledge; but, even in that case, it cannot with justice be insinuated that I have invited petitions against this Bill. And I feel assured that the Most Reverend Prelate, when he has considered the matter with calmness, and with that candour which forms a distinguished feature of his character, will acknowledge that my conduct has not merited the smallest portion of censure or of complaint.

My Lords, I think that the objections of the Right Reverend Prelate (the Bishop of Exeter) have not been answered. The enactments of the Bill are opposed to the canons of the established church in several particulars. One canon (the ninety-fourth, I think) says that the judge of the Arches Court shall not originally summon any person to answer before him, who is not within the diocese or the peculiars of Canterbury, — without the licence of the bishop. But this Bill says that he may exercise original jurisdiction over every clerk whatever in England and Wales. Again, the canons declare that no sentence of deprivation or deposition shall be pronounced against a minister, except by the bishop; but this Bill says that every sentence shall be pronounced by the dean of Arches. I am apprehensive that this measure, instead of diminishing, will rather increase, both the delay and the expense attendant on proceedings in the ecclesiastical courts. It is true that evidence may, under the enactments of this Bill, be taken in the Court of Arches, either by deposition or vivâ voce; but it is probable that, for most cases which occur in the country, a special commission will be issued, of the nature described in this Bill, for taking evidence. The commissioner is to be an advocate, or a barrister of seven years' standing, before whom counsel and proctors are to practise. Now, my Lords, only consider what expense this proceeding will entail upon the parties. Then, again, is it consistent with sound judicial principles that the judge who decides the cause should be a different person from the judge who receives the evidence? Yet such will, in fact, be the effect of this Bill. He is, I presume, to be guided by the notes sent to him by the barrister of seven years' standing. Well,—but issues may be directed to be tried at the assizes or in Westminster Hall; and if the verdict there given be not satisfactory, then there is to be a new trial. Thus, therefore, three, four, or five trials may take place before the sentence is pronounced; from which sentence an appeal to the Judicial Committee may probably follow. On the whole, I think the effect of the Bill will be, to produce both delay and expense in the proceedings against clergymen, and thereby to screen real delinquents, and to expose innocent persons to the risk of persecution from malicious accusations, and the ruin which is too likely to ensue. I therefore concur in the amendment that the Bill be committed this day six months.

The ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY. — I beg to state, by way of explanation, that I did not mean to cast any censure upon the Right Reverend Prelate. I would not have him consider so for a moment.

The House then went into committee: to be again in committee on Monday next; and the Lords summoned.

DURHAM COURT OF PLEAS BILL.

House in committee (according to order); Bill reported, without amendment; and to be read a third time on Thursday next.

BEER ACT.

Petition against alteration of, — of inhabitants of Litlington. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (CANADA).

Petition for the protection of, — of the minister, churchwardens, and inhabitants of Llantilio Pertholey. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Petition of George Frederick Carden, of New Serle Chambers, Lincoln's Inn, in the county of Middlesex, barrister at law, praying that the short-hand writer who attended a committee of this House may be allowed to attend at a trial in the Court of Common Pleas, with the notes taken by him of evidence given by the petitioner before said committee. — Read, and ordered as prayed.

SAINT LEONARD'S AND SEDLESCOMB ROADS BILL.

Petitions in favour of, — of creditors entitled to mortgages of the tolls of the Saint Leonard's and Sedlescomb turnpike road: of owners of property in Sedlescomb: of owners of land in Sedlescomb taken in for the purposes of the turnpike road: of James Troup of Hastings, and David Manser of Rye: and of inhabitants of Saint Leonard's; Ewhurst; Bexhill; and Hastings. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

LOVAT PEERAGE.

Petition of the claimant, that the proper officer of this House do attend, with certain documents, at a trial in the Court of Session in Scotland. — Read, and ordered accordingly.

BRISTOL AND GLOUCESTER RAILWAY BILL.

Petition of William Herapath, of Bristol, Esquire, praying to be heard by counsel against. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Adjourned.

Petitions for Private Bills Committee. — Motion made, and question, "That the committee have leave to sit and proceed to-morrow upon the petition (presented yesterday) from the Warwick and Birmingham Canal Company, for additional provision in the Birmingham Canal Bill," put, and negatived.

Caledonian Canal Committee.—Instruction to the committee, That they have power to inquire into the state of the Crinan Canal.

Manchester and Birmingham Extension (Stone and Rugby) Railway Bill. —

Ordered, That the minutes of evidence taken before the committee on the Bill be printed at the expense of the parties, from the committee clerk's copy, if they think fit.

Liverpool Buildings Bill. — Time enlarged for the committee to report till Thursday, the 20th of June.

Liverpool Churches Bill. — Reported; to be ingrossed.

CHELTENHAM IMPROVEMENT BILL.

Bill reported; motion made, and question put, "That the amendments made by the committee to the Bill be now read a second time."

Mr. C. BERKELEY. — I will state shortly to the House the reasons which induce me to move that this Report be taken into consideration this day six months. Since the year 1824, the town of Cheltenham has been subjected to the control and management of a self-elected body of commissioners of police, who, from certain deficiencies in the provisions of the existing Act, now find it necessary to apply to Parliament for new and extended powers, and to be allowed to include several new streets within the bounds of their jurisdiction. I am willing to admit that a new Bill is requisite for the town of Cheltenham. Under that impression, I allowed this Bill to pass through the first and second readings; but I did so, in consequence, likewise, of the representations of the agent for the commissioners. I presented a petition against the Bill from 2500 of the inhabitants; two public meetings had been held against it; but still I was induced to allow the Bill to pass through the first and second readings, on a distinct promise, by the parliamentary agent for the promoters of the Bill, that certain clauses and alterations would be introduced before it went into committee, in order that it might be made palatable to the great body of the ratepayers. When the Bill was about to be committed, I accordingly called on the parliamentary agent to fulfil that promise; when he turned round upon me, and said that the commissioners did not intend to do any such thing. But I object to the adoption of the Report on much higher grounds. I object to it in consequence of the extraordinary powers which the Bill vests in the commissioners. It presents all the objectionable features of Sturges Bourne's Act. It proposes to confer a plurality of votes on property, and thus completely to overpower and swamp the general body of the ratepayers. I hold in my hand a paper, prepared by the promoters of the Bill, which, no doubt, has been placed in the hands of Honourable Members at the door, with the view of producing a bias on their minds. That paper sets forth that the Bill has been approved by the vestry, and also by a meeting of ratepayers, at which Lord Segrave presided; and states, that the deficiency of the old Act is so obvious that it will be impossible to resist the new one. It is quite true that my noble relative made a statement to that effect; but the sole reason which induced his Lordship to take the chair on that occasion was the distinct understanding which, I assured him, had been come to with the agent for the Bill, that clauses would be introduced, placing the right of electing the commissioners in the body of the ratepayers. The parties who drew up the paper to which I have referred, selected that point which suited their own views, and left the rest entirely unnoticed. I object, then, to this Report, because the parliamentary agent for the Bill had prevented opposition on the second reading by making certain promises which have not been fulfilled; because the Bill, in effect, goes to continue the old self-elected body of commissioners, although it speciously pretends to give free election to the ratepayers; and because it confers a plurality of voting on certain properties, and will thus swamp the rights of the ratepayers. I therefore move that the Report be taken into further consideration this day six months.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — I second the amendment.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL. — The Honourable Member for Cheltenham has stated two grounds — and only two — against the passing of the Bill. The first is, that the parliamentary agent for the Bill departed from an understanding which had been come to in regard to the introduction of certain clauses, and thereby led the Honourable Gentleman into some misconception. This is certainly the first time I have ever heard such a charge brought against a parliamentary agent. I hope it is not in the power of any parliamentary agent to interfere with or prevent any Honourable Member of this House from taking whatever course he may deem proper in reference to any measure that may be introduced? The next ground is, that the commissioners are to be a self-elected body. As I understand the Bill, however, it seems to me that free election is to be the principle. The election, in my opinion, is placed upon the same footing as that of the commissioners of Brighton and other towns. These are the only grounds of objection to the Bill; upon which, I am sure, the House is not prepared to oppose it.

SIR C. LEMON. — I have only one fact to state to the House. A petition, containing allegations against the Bill, was laid before the committee; but no person appeared to support those allegations.

Mr. C. BERKELEY. — In reply to that remark, I have only to say that the parties could not afford to pay ten guineas a-day to counsel.

SIR DE LACY EVANS. — I am not much acquainted with the merits of the question; but I have received a communication from a gentleman who is, which has produced a conviction in my mind that a large body of the ratepayers are opposed to the Bill. That I conceive to be an important ground for the consideration of the House. Besides, the Bill contains clauses which allow plural and proxy voting, — than which nothing can be more objectionable.

Mr. CODRINGTON. — I consider this to be a very necessary Bill, and I believe it is supported by a large majority of the Honourable Member's own constituents. The Bill merely proposes to confer the same advantages on Cheltenham as are enjoyed by Bath, Brighton, and Ramsgate. Of the 2500 persons who signed the petition presented against the Bill by the Honourable Member for Cheltenham, not more than about one sixth were ratepayers; while, on the other hand, a petition signed by above one half of the ratepayers was prepared in support of the Bill, but given up in consequence of its having been thought that the Bill would not be opposed.

Digitized by Google

Mr. G. BERKELEY. — Upon that point I beg to say, there would have been no opposition offered to the Bill if the promoters of it had not broken faith with those by whom it is opposed.

Question put. The House divided: — Ayes 97; Noes 95; — Majority 2.

Warwick Road Bill; Berkeley (Gloucester) Inclosure Bill; Totley, or Dronfield (Derby) Inclosure Bill; Unstone (Derby) Inclosure Bill; Ringstead (Northampton) Inclosure Bill; Napier's Divorce Bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS,

That they have agreed to — South Eastern Railway Bill; Basingstoke Roads Bill; Clun (Salop) Inclosure Bill; Comberton (Cambridge) Inclosure Bill, with amendments.

That they have passed a Bill, intituled, "An Act to enable the Mayor and Commonalty, and Citizens of the City of London to let and sell Parcels of Ground in Saint George's Fields, near Bethlem Hospital, to the Governors of the said Hospital."

MISCELLANEOUS PETITIONS.

The following petitions were severally presented, and ordered to lie on the table; namely, —

Education. — Against the proposed scheme of national education recently laid before Parliament, as approved by the Committee of Privy Council, — from Wendover; Water Stratford; Barnstaple; and Ravenstone.

Postage, — For a low and uniform rate, — from York; Quin; and Hammersmith (chairman of a meeting).

Sunday Delivery of Letters, — From Iscoyd, against the transmission of letters through London on the Lord's Day.

Railways (Ireland), — From Carrickfergus, against the proposed measure.

Of the chairman of the Dublin and Drogheda Railway Company, for empowering the Board of Works to make loans to existing companies.

Maynooth College, — From Olney and Warrington, against further endowment.

Church Establishment (Canada and other Colonies), — From Adstock, in support.

Sale of Beer Bill, — Committee deferred from Thursday next, till Wednesday, 19th of June.

COURT OF CHANCERY (IRELAND) BILL.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — I beg to know whether it is the intention of the Government to bring forward the Court of Chancery (Ireland) Bill this Session? and, if so, how soon?

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — The draught of the Bill has been prepared, and is now under the consideration of the Treasury; but I cannot say whether or not it will be in the power of the Government to lay it before Parliament this Session.

RETURNS, &c.

Yeomanry. — On the motion of Mr. SANFORD, Return ordered —

Of the number of troops or corps or regiments of effective yeomanry of Great Britain and Ireland, according to the last muster roll; stating the date of that muster, and distinguishing the number of officers and men in each corps or regiment, and the expense of each corps in 1838; showing the manner in which the sums voted for Great Britain and Ireland in that year were expended.

Foreign and Colonial Wheat. — On the motion of Mr. E. TENNENT, Return ordered, —

Showing the quantities of foreign and colonial wheat and wheat flour, stated in quantities at the rate of 392 lbs. of flour to each quarter, that were imported and taken for consumption in each month, from the last day of January, 1839, to the last day of May, 1839; showing, also, the quantity remaining in warehouse at the end of each month; the monthly average price of wheat according to the London Gazette; the average rate of duty per quarter on foreign and colonial wheat respectively, and the amount of duty received in each month.

Printed Papers. — Copy presented of the short-hand writer's notes of the proceedings in the case of Stockdale v. Hansard (ordered the 31st of May). — To lie on the table, and to be printed.

ELECTIVE FRANCHISE.

SIR H. FLEETWOOD. — Sir, the Bill for which I am now going to move, is one of so much importance that I shall endeavour to confine myself to a statement of its general principles, and to show that, in introducing a subject like the present, I am calling on you to consider a question than which none of greater moment ever came under the consideration of the House. The question is one of the utmost importance as connected with the representation of the country. I have sought information from all political parties on the subject; and I have invariably found that all admit that my Bill is founded on just constitutional principles, and contains within it nothing that can alarm the most timid, as being likely to affect the existing institutions of the country. I had given notice of my motion on the subject long before the Noble Lord the Member for Stroud had published his address to his constituents; and the sentiments, in that pamphlet, are in accordance with the views I am now advocating. Being accustomed to regard that Noble Lord as the leader of the question of reform in this House, I was gratified to find that such was the case, and that I could extend the franchise to an immense number of persons, without militating against the present constitution of the Reform Bill. Sir, I hope that the question can be entertained without at all affecting that measure as at present constituted. The object of this Bill is merely to confer upon parties possessing the same qualification and amount of property, the franchise at present enjoyed by others under the Reform Bill. I hold that the 10*l.* household franchise, enjoyed at present by parties residing in cities and borough towns, should be extended to parties who, in respect of property and intelligence, are very far superior to many now voting for Members of Parliament. If the individuals for whom I am seeking to obtain the franchise possess the same property qualifications as those who at present enjoy it, it cannot be said that I am extending the principle of the Reform Bill. There is another objection urged against this measure,—namely, that although the 10*l.* householder may be a fit voter for a town, he has not the proper qualification as a voter in a county constituency. The 10*l.* householders, to whom I propose to extend the franchise, are not those resident within parliamentary boroughs, but those who reside in remote rural districts, to which no borough representation attaches; and who, at the present moment, though possessed of very considerable property, have no voice whatever, in the choice of representatives. They are persons who have little or no interest in boroughs, and who are almost entirely dependent upon agriculture; they are therefore very fit parties to be introduced into the county constituency. It has been urged, as an objection against my proposition, that the old constituency of the counties, particularly in the large manufacturing districts, will be swamped by the new votes I propose to create. I believe that there is no ground whatever for any apprehension upon that head. I would draw the attention of the House to the wording of the motion, which provides that the franchise shall not be given to the holder of a house of less value than 10*l.*, the same as in boroughs. Sir, if there was any danger of swamping the votes in manufacturing districts, the danger would, under the present system, exist in the small towns. I am, on the contrary, aware that, at present, in several manufacturing towns, where the principal mill-owners are of Liberal opinions, the representatives sent to Parliament are Conservative. I am satisfied that, under the proposed Bill, so much property is required as qualification, that no manufacturing interest will be able to swamp the county constituency. In the borough which I represent, many persons vote for both the county and town. It may be said that it is not desirable, or in agreement with the principle of the Reform Bill, to give the same persons the right of voting in counties and towns; but, on turning to the 50*l.* tenant at will clause in that measure, I find that persons are entitled to vote by occupancy as well as by property, and thus vote for county and town. Sir, I am aware that one great difficulty in bringing forward this question at this time is, that the county constituency may be considered by Honourable Gentlemen opposite as perfect. Now, I will put a question to Honourable Gentleman opposite. Suppose the corn law question were again in agitation; would they, if this Bill had passed, have as great majorities in favour of their views upon it? With respect to this Bill, I can assure the House that I have had communications with persons well qualified to give an opinion, and they agree with me in thinking that the qualification I now propose would add greatly to the intelligence and independence of county constituencies. I will endeavour to show that, in supporting this measure, we are not vitiating the spirit of the Reform Bill, but merely extending its provisions to persons now accidentally excluded. I wish to have the privilege extended to doctors, merchants, and lawyers residing in villages or villas outside parliamentary boroughs, and to many of what I may term the shopocracy. I call on the House seriously to consider my proposal. The country is now in a quiescent state, anxiously awaiting our decision, and anticipating further benefits from the Reform Bill. With these remarks I shall conclude; and I beg leave to move for leave to bring in a Bill to extend the qualification of voters for Members of Parliament representing English and Welsh counties to the occupier of a house of the clear annual value of 10*l.*, the same as in boroughs.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—Sir, I am sure the House will feel that nothing could be more temperate and judicious than the manner in which the Honourable Baronet has introduced his motion. He has stated the grounds upon which he thinks the House ought to accede to the motion, both as being consistent with the Reform Bill, and as being an improvement of the present state of the franchise in the counties. There was one part of his argument in which, undoubtedly, I agree with him, and in which my agreement is well known to the world. I certainly consider that the introduction of the 50*l.* tenant at will clause, carried to the extent of giving the right of voting to the occupant of property in counties, and thereby destroying the ancient tenure of freehold, — with the additional disadvantage of placing the limit of the value of the property at 50*l.*, — was a most injurious and dangerous change in the Reform Bill, and it was one which the Government of that day felt itself bound to oppose. The ground upon which it was argued by a Noble Lord, now a Member of the other House of Parliament, both in this House and in the country, was, that, if it was right to give to a 10*l.* householder the right of voting in towns, then it was very unjust to deprive the 50*l.* occupier in counties of the same right of voting; that it was an obvious partiality in favour of the residents in towns, and an injustice and injury to the agricultural population of the kingdom. If that argument was a good one,—I do not think it was,—but if it was a good one, undoubtedly it would go to the extent of giving to voters in counties the same right of voting as is held in towns, because, in point of character, and in point of property and of respectability, no one can deny that the occupier out of the limits of a borough is as fit to exercise the franchise as those living within it. Therefore, in bringing down the limit of tenure which those who proposed the Reform Bill intended to keep up, I thought a change was made which would lead, in point of reason, in point of fairness, and perhaps in point of effect, to further changes. However, the Government was defeated on that occasion. Lord Althorp stated the reasons for objecting to the proposition. Those reasons were not satisfactory to the House, and we were defeated by a considerable majority. The opinion of the Marquess of Chandos prevailed in this House, and was even countenanced and deemed acceptable in the House of Lords. That was a sufficient reason, in the opinion of the Government, why the 50*l.* franchise, then proposed, should be introduced into the Reform Bill. I therefore agree so far with the Honourable Baronet, that, in point of fairness and of justice, if I am asked whether a 10*l.* resident out of the limits of the borough is not as fit to vote as a resident within the limits, I must say, decidedly, and at once, that I think he is.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

I think it is unfortunate that the 50*l.* tenants were ever introduced into the Reform Bill.

[Cheers, and cries of "Hear!" from the Opposition.]

I do think so.

[Renewed cheers.]

I certainly do not now wish to deprive them, or any of those who enjoy rights under the Reform Bill, of the exercise of those rights; but I think the principle leads very naturally to the motion of the Honourable Baronet this night.

But now I come to the objections to be made to that motion. The Honourable Baronet has himself admitted that the question is of such great importance, that the proposition is so large and so extensive a one,—that of introducing a new class of voters,—that it cannot be expected that either the Government or the House should entertain it at this time of the Session. But, putting aside that objection, which seems to me a sufficient one, against the immediate adoption of so great a change,—I think, likewise, that there are very serious and substantial objections to the proposition, at whatever period it may be brought forward. The Honourable Baronet, in the course of his speech, has alluded to some of those objections. He has stated what he thinks to be the inequality which now occurs with respect to voters in boroughs returning Members to Parliament. It would be necessary to revise the distinction made in the Reform Bill, which was intended to provide that persons holding property in the borough should not, by virtue of the same property, be enabled to vote in the county. That distinction, whether good or bad, wise or unwise, was made in the Reform Bill; and it would be necessary to enter into the whole question on that point.

There is likewise one very important question as to what would be the practical effect of such a change with respect to the elections in counties. That is a question with regard to which I am not now able to pronounce an opinion. The inclination of my opinion is, that the electoral body would rather be improved than otherwise by such an addition. But I have not sufficient information to enable me to pronounce a decisive opinion upon that point. There is another objection which it is obvious will be taken by persons of various parties who have considered the Reform Bill, and who would look upon this change not merely as an extension of the right of voting,—not as an extension directly in conformity with the principles of the Reform Bill,—but as an extension going beyond the Bill, and as being a new right of voting, not conferred by that Act. These are objections that would be made, and are of a sufficiently serious character to induce any Government not merely to decline agreeing with the proposition of the Honourable Baronet as to voting for his motion now, but to decline giving him any reason to suppose that, if brought forward on another day, it would meet with their concurrence.

The Honourable Baronet has said that he wished to have some explanations from me with regard, not merely to his own proposition, but with regard to any proposition of a similar nature. In accordance with his wish,—and, I think, in accordance with the wish of many who have asked me my opinion with respect to certain points,—I will first state, generally, that I think there are three different parties. I do not speak, now, merely of the common division of political parties, but I say, that there are three different modes of viewing the Reform Act. There is a considerable number, I am sorry to say, who, while adhering to the letter of the Reform Act, and being quite willing to profess their adherence to every word and syllable of that Act, yet wish to pervert and abuse the spirit of that Act—who wish to prevent persons from having the franchise which is given to them by that Act—and who vexatiously oppose their maintaining that franchise—and who, likewise, are very forward, by means of intimidation and corruption, to prevent them from freely exercising that franchise. From those who thus act, I need not say, I entirely differ. There are many others who view the Reform Act in another light. I may refer to a letter in the newspapers of this day, written by the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin, who takes this view of that measure; and great numbers agree with him. He considers that the Reform Act has been a total failure, and that it is necessary to have a new law, giving the franchise a far more extensive range, and providing for a duration of Parliament extremely short, at the same time depriving the Crown of the prerogative of dissolution, and adopting, also, a secret mode of voting,—which he and his supporters think would be a protection to the voter. That is a proposal for an entire abandonment of the Reform Act, as it at present exists; it is, in short, a proposal for an entirely new system of legislation upon the subject. I need not now discuss the reasons upon which that proposal is founded. The propositions—many of them, I admit, extremely plausible ones—which are put forward by those who advocate that system of legislation,—I can only say, are such as I cannot agree to. There is a third system, which consists in taking the Reform Act as a basis, and in saying that they will introduce into the Reform Act, and found upon it, any corrections and improvements which, as a legislative measure, it must necessarily from time to time require. That is the general opinion I, also, entertain with respect to the Reform Act. I cannot deny that, wherever that Act, in its provisions, is defective,—or where, by means not perceived at the time, it has become abused and perverted from the spirit in which it was proposed by Earl Grey,—it is expedient and just, and even necessary, to consider what amendments may properly be introduced.

Without going into all the questions which may arise upon this subject, I will mention one upon which a Bill was introduced by my Honourable and Learned Friend the Attorney General several years ago, which has been renewed during several years, and which is now again before the House. With respect to that measure, relating to the registration of voters, it appears to me more and more, year after year, that the vexations, incident to the retention of the franchise are much greater and more extensive than I could ever have supposed they could be. I do think, when you have seventy-five barristers going to the different parts of the country, and those very barristers not going to the same counties in different years, but changing their circuits, to decide upon various questions respecting the rights of voters,—and when you have a number of persons ready to go to any expense for the purpose of questioning the rights of voters,—that the system does become a hardship and an injury to the holders of the franchise, which imperatively calls for amendment. I frequently receive letters upon this subject from persons who represent, not their own grievances, but the grievances of others, stating that it often occurs to persons to be obliged to travel many miles, year after year, in order to defend their votes, and that they find, on coming into the registration courts, that there is neither any objection or objector for them to meet. This is a matter not affecting one party, merely, or another. It affects all. But if you really mean that persons having a bonâ fide franchise should retain it, you ought to endeavour to do away with this vexatious mode of proceeding. We proposed, two years ago, a plan which, I think, would have been found a very great improvement,—that of diminishing the number of revising barristers, and determining that, instead of a fluctuating court, with seventy-five learned gentlemen, there should be only ten or eleven barristers, forming a permanent court, to decide on all questions relating to the elective franchise. That Bill was rejected by the House of Lords. We proposed another Bill, last year, which had not the same efficacy, but which would still have diminished, in some degree, the number of vexatious objections,—I mean, the proposal to impose costs on the party making such objection. But even that Bill was not acceptable to the House of Lords. It was thought necessary by their Lordships to add to it that which we had carefully kept out of view, by the introduction of a clause, decidedly in favour of one party on a disputed right of voting. The effect of all this, and of the many observations which have been made to me upon the Registration Bill introduced this year, on my mind, has been this;—that, although I am certainly not, after several discussions upon the subject with my Honourable and Learned Friend the Attorney General, and with my colleagues in office, prepared to say, exactly, what should be the details of the remedy; yet I am prepared to say that we ought altogether to revise the whole system of registration. I am sure it will be necessary both to have a permanent court and a smaller number of revising barristers; and I think it will be necessary to provide, by some means or other,—perhaps by giving a longer period for the register to run,—that the voter should not be called upon so constantly and perpetually to defend his right, and be subjected so frequently to an expensive and vexatious contest in the court of the revising barrister. In saying this, I think the motion before us is a question entirely separate from that which the Right Honourable Gentleman (Sir R. Peel) discusses in his Bill respecting election petitions. I shall be disposed, certainly, not to concur in any motion at present, which would place in his Bill clauses with respect to any change in the constitution of the courts of the revising barristers. But I think that Parliament, in another Session, should reconsider the whole subject, and endeavour to form a court with which this House and the country in general might be satisfied.

There are other questions, which relate, not to the mode of registration, but to the mode in which a person obtains a right to have his name placed in the list of voters. We took very great care in the Reform Bill that the voter should not merely have the property which we declared was necessary to give him a vote, but that he should pay sufficient rates and taxes to show that he was a bonâ fide holder of the property to which the Parliament intended to give the franchise. My argument, I confess, when discussing this measure and imposing these restrictions, was, that if we imposed too severe terms, it would be far more easy to relax that severity if we gave the franchise to a class of voters who were not entitled to it, than to take away that franchise when it had once been given. Experience has convinced me that, with regard to these restrictions, we have gone farther than was at all necessary, to insure the respectability of the voter. I think the general principle is the right one; and that the ancient principle of paying scot and lot is a principle to which we ought to adhere; but I do think, that you can ascertain the respectability of a person who merely pays rates (which is the interpretation given to the expression of "paying scot and lot"), without putting any further restrictions upon him, which only have the effect of depriving many men of the franchise who are clearly entitled to it. It was with that view that I, last year, introduced a Bill, and which was carried through this House, by which the time for paying the rates was changed, and instead of the voter having to pay, in June or July, what had become due in April, he would only have to pay in July what was due in the previous October. I think the principle of that Bill was a correct one; and I think, moreover, that, if you take care that there has been a payment of the poor rates for any number of months, or for a year, you ought not, likewise, to insist upon the payment of the assessed taxes. That I consider a needless and vexatious system. I find, from all I have heard, that, instead of the right of voting being granted, as it was apprehended it might be, by those who proposed the Reform Bill, to persons not entitled to it, on the contrary, hundreds of persons, who are fully entitled to it, do not enjoy it,—owing to the manner in which these clauses of the Bill are framed. That, therefore, is a matter upon which I think we may fairly propose an amendment; and, in doing so, we shall be acting not contrary to the spirit, but in the very spirit, in which the Reform Act was prepared. With respect to other matters of the same kind, as they are not immediately now in question, I do not see that there is any reason to detain the House upon them. I have already stated the general principle upon which I am disposed to go. That general principle is, to adopt any amendment in the franchise which is in conformity with the principles of the Reform Act, and in analogy to the general provisions of it; but not to adopt any altogether new scheme of representation. With regard to my general views, it is unnecessary for me to repeat them now, because I have, on several occasions, expressed them, and have even, perhaps, with some degree of rashness, ventured to discuss those general views. All I wish now to state is, that, not concurring with the Honourable Baronet in his present motion, — not giving to that Gentleman any promise that I will, at a future period, concur in it, — I, at the same time, think he is fairly entitled to ask the consideration of the House upon a question of this kind. It does appear to me a question fairly brought forward, and that, if you adopt his proposition, you will not be introducing any very dangerous innovation; but, at the same time, it is not one to which I, on the part of the Government, can give my concurrence. I do not know that it is requisite for me to enter further into this subject, or to state anything with regard to my general principles in connection with it, — those being already known to the House and the country.

Mr. WARBURTON. — Sir, in my opinion, it may be fairly collected that a very large majority of the people of England, and of the Members sitting on the Liberal side of the House, are not satisfied with the representation of the United Kingdom as it now stands. This being the feeling of a large majority of the people, the question is, whether the Members sitting on the Liberal side of the House will be satisfied unless the Government are prepared to take the amendment of the Reform Act in hand? If we were convinced that the Government would act upon that feeling,—that they would be for measures of progressive reform,— and that, as fast as evils and defects were found in the system of representation, they would be prepared to propose amendments,— I believe that the people and the Liberal Members of the House would be willing to leave the amendment with the Government. If we are told that the Government will take the matter into their own hands, — (though really in what manner I am precisely to interpret the declarations of the Noble Lord, I feel considerable difficulty to understand), — but if we were informed that the Government will take the matter in hand, I am persuaded that, on my side of the House, there is every disposition to forbearance, and to wait for the measure which the Government may think proper to introduce. I do not believe that the Liberals are at all impatient. They do not wish to press upon the Government, in the present state of the Session, to produce a measure for all those amendments they consider necessary. Let the Government declare their willingness to correct the defects of the Reform Bill; and, without urging them to produce any measure conformable with such declaration, this Session, all that the Liberals ask is, that they will throw open their door to receive suggestions from the Liberal party, in the same manner as they did previous to the introduction of the Reform Bill. What I contend against is, that so many separate and unconnected changes are proposed at once; whereas, if any Gentleman would examine into the nature of this case, he would find in how close a manner all those different measures hang together. There is the measure of the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, who proposes to make a perfectly impartial tribunal for settling all those questions that now come before election committees. That is, no doubt, a legitimate object; but what I and my friends complain of is, that it is a detached measure, and will not cure any present defect that arises out of the existing system of trial before election committees. The real question is, How can gentlemen of moderate fortune be induced to become Members of this House? At present it is only necessary for any opponent to present a petition, in order to deter persons of moderate income from attempting to obtain seats in Parliament. There is, for instance, one committee now sitting on an election petition in the Carlow case. I take it for granted that that committee is perfectly prepared, according to the law of election, to do justice. But see how long it has been sitting!

Now, one mode for correcting this evil would be, that of making the registration of voters final. In that case the greater number of questions which now come before an election committee would be taken out of the record. But if we make the registration of voters final, would it not be necessary that we should amend the constitution of the registration court? Is it not necessary — instead of having, — not merely those 75 barristers, as the Noble Lord stated, but those 150 revising barristers which we have at present — to have a limited number of gentlemen with competent salaries, competent to try such cases, and upon whose decision the public would place confidence? I take these measures as an example, with a view to show how they are all necessarily connected together; and how impossible it is, if we take them separately, to deal justly with the laws relating to the constitution of the representative system. Therefore it is that I say, with the present state of dissatisfaction among the people, that if the Government is really at the head of the Liberal party, they are bound to do that which the Liberal party call upon them to do — that is, to give notice of their intention to propose a Bill for amending the Reform Act, which Bill shall embrace all the objects which I have alluded to, and many others to which I have not yet alluded. If they will do that, instead of the Liberal party of the country being depressed and discouraged in spirit, which they now are, the Government will raise their spirits and give courage to the Reform party throughout the United Kingdom; and instead of our being almost afraid to meet a general election, and anticipating discomfiture from so meeting the constituency of the country as it now stands, we would, if spirit and courage were given to us by such an announcement, be the foremost, and as ready as — nay, more ready than — the Honourable Gentlemen opposite, to meet a general election. But if the matter remain as it now is, — if the constituency be left in its present state, — then I will say that I anticipate discomfiture for the Liberal party at the next general election; and not only that, but I do believe that at any future general election the Liberal party may expect that their situation will be worse than it now is.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

I like to state what my real opinion is. Now, I tell the Honourable Gentlemen opposite that the Liberal party feel satisfied — as all will admit — that they are the most numerous. I say that, in the aggregate, they are the most powerful, — have the most property, — and are the most influential body in the state; and they will not submit permanently to be left in such a position that, whenever a general election is to be met, they shall find their situation growing worse and worse. Therefore, I say, that if the Government, whom the Liberal party consent to place at their head, will not take upon itself to place the Liberal party in that position, which, they contend, from their numbers, their wealth, and their influence, they have a right to hold, — then, the Liberal party must act, independently of the Government, for themselves. The division on the ballot will show what their strength is. They must, I say, act for themselves, and throw themselves upon the country for support, and take those measures which they think necessary, by means without and means within this House, for giving supremacy to their opinions. I would, then, urge, that if there were the smallest encouragement on the part of the Government to lead us to believe that they would take the amendment of the Reform Act under their patronage, there would be the greatest forbearance shown by the Liberal party, both in the House and out of it. Sir, the Liberal party in the House would be glad to leave the subject in the hands of the Government, if the Government would take it into their hands; — if measures like that proposed by the Honourable Baronet in the motion now before the House — if measures which the Noble Lord admits to be of a moderate character, like this — were only sure to be fairly considered by the Government, — for I would be satisfied with that. I say that, because I, for one, fully admit the force of the argument of the Noble Lord, that he has not duly considered all the bearings of the measure, — that he must have recourse to the statistics of representation to see the effects of the measure; — that very circumstance is a fair argument for saying that the Government will take the suggestions into consideration, and will deliberate whether or not it be fit that they should introduce a Bill for the amendment of the Reform Act; and it might be an argument why the Honourable Baronet should not press the present motion to a division. If I interpret the words of the Noble Lord aright, he, individually, approves of the present motion, but says that the Government cannot consent to it. I am glad that, so far as his statement goes, the Noble Lord considers this to be a reasonable proposition to be made. What course the Honourable Baronet will take upon this occasion, I do not know; but I think that it is a very fit occasion for the members of the Liberal party to give vent to their opinions; and after he has heard them, the Honourable Baronet will be prepared to state what course he means to take with respect to this measure,—whether he will divide the House upon it, or whether he will leave it for the consideration of her Majesty's Government? For my own part, I do not ask for any determination on the part of the Government, or for any immediate decision, either upon this or upon any other question, as to the representation of the people; but if Government will agree to take into their consideration the amendment of the Reform Act, in such parts as they think require amendment, I would recommend my Honourable Friend to forbear from pressing a measure of this kind in the present Session, and to await the production of a Bill which I shall be glad to hear announced by her Majesty's Government.

SIR ROBERT PEEL.—Sir, I really cannot concur with the Honourable Gentleman the Member for Bridport, that the speech of the Noble Lord the Secretar of State for the Home Department was obscure and equivocal. I did distinctly understand the Noble Lord to say that, in certain respects, he would admit alterations in what is called the Reform Act, and the Noble Lord did distinctly define what was to be their extent. He left nothing vague or unexplicit on that head. With regard to that definition, the Noble Lord stated that he would agree to an important alteration with respect to the law of registration: he insisted that 75 barristers were much too many; that the several revision courts ought to be limited to one of a much more permanent character; and that the decisions of the barristers ought to admit of appeal to that court. Then, again, as to the main provisions of the Act, the Noble Lord declared that he was in favour of a relaxation of the tax-paying clauses; that with respect to the payment of the poor-rates, additional time should be granted; and with respect to the payment of the assessed taxes,—having the security of the payment of the poor-rates, they ought not to persist in requiring payment of those taxes. Listening, as I have been, to the Noble Lord, I did not put that construction on his speech which has been put by the Honourable Gentleman. It is, I think, impossible to charge the Noble Lord with being obscure or unexplicit. I took down the Noble Lord's words: the Noble Lord stated that the Honourable Baronet's present proposal was fairly entitled to be the subject of consideration,—that proposal being to give to the 10*l.* householders in counties, not residing within boroughs, the right of voting for counties; but the Noble Lord stated, also, that it was not a subject to which, either on his own part, or on the part of the Government, he could give any concurrence: and he said, further, that he could neither give such concurrence at the present moment, nor hold out to the Honourable Gentleman any expectation of such concurrence for the future. And if that is a fair interpretation of what the Noble Lord stated, how is it possible for the Honourable Member for Bridport to charge the Noble Lord with being vague or inexplicit? I have no doubt, from what the Noble Lord stated with respect to the merits of the present measure, that he means to resist this motion; but whether I shall or shall not have the satisfaction of voting with the Noble Lord, or whatever may be the Noble Lord's intention, it is my meaning, even if I stand alone, to resist the proposal of the Honourable Gentleman, and to offer to it every opposition in my power.

Now, I look at the arguments which have been used in support of the present motion. It is said that the 10*l.* householders, living out of boroughs, are as respectable, probably, and as well entitled to vote for the counties, as the 10*l.* householders living within boroughs; but this was not a principle adopted by the Reform Bill; and if we now adopt this proposition, we should be admitting an indefinite number of voters in the counties, to the entire destruction of the finality of the Reform Act. If it were a good principle, that, because 10*l.* householders are entitled to vote in boroughs, therefore 10*l.* householders, not living in boroughs, ought to vote for counties, then it follows, as a matter of course, that 40*s.* freeholders in boroughs, having now a right to vote for the counties, ought to vote for the boroughs; that there ought not to be any distinction between the rights of voting; and, in fact, that there should be a complete uniformity in those rights. The Noble Lord thought that the introduction of the 50*l.* clause made a difference. If there was any difference, it was open for the Government to reject the 50*l.* clause; but I do not see that the admission of the 50*l.* clause made any difference; and even if it had made a difference, it ought to have been stated when the Reform Bill was under consideration. If the 10*l.* householders were to be admitted to vote in counties, it would have been prudent to have stated so much at the time, and an arrangement should have been then made. We were told, at that time, that the measure of reform was most extensive; it was admitted that, in a country like this, in which there were such complicated relations of society, to make an experiment with safety, we should make it so extensive as that it ought to satisfy the country. That is a good ground for resisting the motion of the Honourable Gentleman. Then, Sir, the Noble Lord described three classes of opinions which existed with respect to the Reform Act. First, there was his own opinion, which was in favour of an adherence to the general provisions of that Act, but admitting of alteration in its details; secondly, there were those who, like the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin, entirely distrusted the Reform Bill, as a failure, and wished for further changes in the representative system; and, thirdly, there were those who adhered to the letter of the Reform Act, but who wished to deprive the people of their legitimate rights under that Act, and to prevent their exercise, by intimidation and corruption. Now, I utterly disclaim belonging to any one of those classes; for while I adopt the spirit of the Reform Act, I do not wish to deprive the people of their rights under it; and I abominate the depriving them of that right by any corruption or intimidation. There is, therefore, a fourth class of persons, who supported the Reform Act as a settlement of a great constitutional question, — as final as it could be, for it is impossible to make even the most final measure of legislation without incurring the chance of its requiring change at some time or other. This class accepted it in the spirit in which it was offered by Lord Grey and by Lord Althorp, and took it in that sense as final,—a class who wish it to be carried out in that spirit, and who detest any species of intimidation or of corruption which would prevent the exercise, by the people, of the right to which they are fairly entitled. It is because I consider the Reform Act as a great constitutional settlement of the electoral system, that I resist any inroad attempted upon it.

The Honourable Gentleman the Member for Bridport asked the Noble Lord for some vague intimation of an intention. He said that the Noble Lord ought to give some vague statement of his opinions; but I say that such advice ought to be rejected by the Noble Lord. The Honourable Member asks the Noble Lord to give some general assurances for the purpose of deceiving the country. He asks for some deceiving and bewildering proposition, not for the purpose of improving the constitution of the country, but for enabling the Liberal party to fight, with some effect, their battle on the hustings. Sir, if you (Mr. Warburton) represent the Liberal party, I can tell you why you have lost the confidence of the country. If such are the principles on which you act, — if such is the advice you give,— that is the reason why you have lost the general confidence of the country. It is quite right in the Government to be explicit upon this point. If they mean to alter the Reform Act, they ought to come down and say it; but I protest against the new system of conducting the public affairs. The measures of the Government ought to be fully considered, both as to their principles, and in their details; but when they are ready, they ought to be submitted to Parliament. The executive Government ought to be responsible for the measures of legislation introduced, — throwing the future responsibility on the Legislature, either to adopt or to reject them. Such a system is not acted upon now; it is, now, the fashion not to legislate at present, but to give some assurance as to the future; and I can conceive nothing more calculated to prejudice the public interests, or to lower the character of the representative body with the public. It is calling upon the Parliament to be responsible for the acts of the Executive, and completely confounding the relations of the executive Government and of the representative body. Would the Honourable Member for Bridport be satisfied if the new Parliament, which is to be assembled, were not to meet till 1842? Would the Honourable Gentleman be satisfied with that? think he would. For any Gentleman more easily satisfied — not with the smallest modicum of reform, but with a mere proposal which would enable him to make a better figure on the hustings — than the Honourable Member for Bridport, I never saw. If, indeed, the Liberal party have lost the confidence of the country by giving such advice, let them repent them of their error; let them adopt an open and manly course of proceeding; and do not let them ask for any vague assurance of what would be proposed to be done at some future period. I can tell the Honourable Baronet that he would give no satisfaction by the present measure,— the extension of the 10*l.* franchise: let them not flatter themselves that it would be more final than the present system.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

Then why do you not tell the House what you do require? See; here is an Honourable Gentleman urging the Government to promise to consider a measure — and yet he is obliged, by the cheers that respond to my question, to admit that the grant of the 10*l.* franchise was only to be the stepping-stone to some other measure. He asks her Majesty's Government to give an assurance upon the abstract merits of the present case, knowing well that the unenfranchised classes in the towns and in the boroughs would afterwards press with tenfold vigour their own claims. Have we not been told, and has it not been written, that the 10*l.* householders are the very worst class of persons to whom the franchise could be conceded? And though the Honourable Baronet endeavours to conciliate them by giving them the new name of the shopocracy, and saying that to these would be added the medical gentlemen, and the gentlemen residing in villas,—yet no union of the gentry, the medical men, and the shopocracy, would ever reconcile the unenfranchised classes. We have, then, the admission of the representative of the Liberal party in this House,—the declaration of the Honourable Member for Bridport,—that this alteration would be of no value, except as the foundation of future measures. But, says the Honourable Gentleman, if you will not yield this measure, the Liberal party will appeal to the country in favour of those measures which they advocate. Why,—has not that appeal been made?

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

On the question of the ballot there was no forbearance, nor on the question of the corn laws, nor on any of the questions of public interest have they ever forborne pressing their measures upon the country. The real fact is, that I have entertained a better opinion of the Liberal party than it appears they deserve, if the Honourable Gentleman is to be taken as their representative.

[Cries of "No, no!" from the Liberal Members.]

I had given them credit—and still, notwithstanding the disclaimer, I must give them credit—for not neglecting any fair and legitimate mode of giving full effect to their own opinions. Sir, this being my impression, I will not trouble the House with any further arguments upon this question. After the admission extorted from the Honourable Gentleman who has called for a declaration of the opinion of the Government, in order that he and some others may cut a better figure upon the hustings, I am satisfied that any dissatisfaction which might exist because there was no further reform brought forward, would be only increased by any partial measure of legislation. In the fair spirit in which the Reform Act was offered by Lord Althorp and Lord Grey, I accepted it, and I wish it to be carried out in the same spirit. The Noble Lord calls for a discussion on the question of registration and of the rate-paying clauses. With respect to the last of these, I shall express no opinion; but I never stated anything with a deeper conviction of its truth, than I now state, that we should not advance the interests of the country so much by any new scheme of representation, as by a faithful and punctual discharge of the duties committed to us, and by showing our constituents and the country that we are fully qualified to discharge those duties.

Mr. D. W. HARVEY.—Sir, I entirely agree with the suggestion of the Honourable Member for Bridport, that it is desirable, upon the present occasion, that those Honourable Members who take a large and deep interest in the cause of parliamentary reform should embrace this very opportunity of expressing their candid and unrestrained sentiments. This is not only due to themselves, to their constituents, and to the country, but also to the Government. I confess that I do not enter into those feelings of surprise, or of disappointment, intimated by my Honourable Friend the Member for Bridport, at a speech containing declarations so clearly and so unequivocally made as were those of the Noble Lord. They entirely coincided with my expectations. It is true that, during the last month, I could scarcely meet a person who was, or wished to be, a politician, who had not some secret and undefined expectation that the Government would be prepared to outstrip the most liberal anticipations of their supporters; and who did not reprobate any doubts which were expressed that the Government was not prepared to make any considerable advances in the cause of what is called parliamentary reform. But, however strong those expectations may have been, and on whatever basis they may have been raised, I never looked for any other declaration than that which has been so clearly, so unequivocally, and, I will add, so manfully and so openly made by the Noble Lord. I am still eager for further and great reforms; and I will remain consistent to the last as the advocate of them. But however I may have been pleased to find that the Noble Lord went to no inconsiderable extent in his wishes to carry out further the principles of the Reform Act, I own I should have regretted, after the Noble Lord's reiterated opinion, delivered in this House and recorded in his address to the electors of Stroud, if, for any party purposes, he had bent his opinions; or had endeavoured to countenance an idea that, to purchase a truce from hostility, he would make a partial change in his opinions. If, therefore, I vote for the motion of the Honourable Baronet, it is only for the purpose of showing that I am one of those who are anxious for further progress in the path of reform, however slow that progress may be. For myself, however, I think it is undesirable to be constantly dabbling in these small constitutional suggestions, and in this little ware of reform. I should be glad to see the Government giving a title to a Bill, and calling it "A Bill to reform the Reform Act:" I should be glad to see such a title, with the objects distinctly stated, and the details so considered that it might be, as far as it could be made so, both ample and final. But till this shall be done, I think it better that the time of the House should not be wasted, and that expectations should not be held out, to the real postponement of valuable measures of legislation, unless the Government are prepared to introduce a measure such as that to which I have referred, — a measure that will be satisfactory and agreeable to the wishes of the people. My Honourable Friend will allow me to say that I think he cannot excite in this country a feeling in favour of a restricted measure like the present. The Reformers, in all our towns, will not thank this House for a restrictive measure. No; their cry is, "You must largely extend the suffrage; you must limit the duration of Parliament; you must provide ample protection for the voter, whether it be by the ballot or by penalties against intimidation and corruption." I did hope that the Right Honourable Gentleman the Member for Tamworth would not have been content to declare in such strong and unambiguous terms his hostility to corruption, without announcing, at the same time, that he would give his succour to any plan for destroying those evils of which he complains. If the Right Honourable Baronet had done so, I should have been prepared to say that he was by far a better representative of a better system of government and reform than any to be found at present on the Treasury bench. I should then have inferred, from the hostility of the Right Honourable Baronet to the corruptions existing in our present system of elections, that he would be prepared to adopt even the ballot, if no better plan could be proposed for putting a stop to them. But, Sir, as the Right Honourable Baronet has now spoken, it was mere declamation, and well calculated to secure or excite an impression that he is friendly to such a reform, while at the same time he left the House in so much doubt as to whether the corruption might not be as rife, and the intimidation as awful, as they have been on recent occasions. Sir, there is another point on which I am anxious to express an opinion. I am not one of those who consider that, without reform, this House is not capable of proceeding with objects of useful legislation, — quite otherwise; for though I am a decided advocate for such objects, yet I do believe that the House contains within itself the elements of sound legislation. I do not conceal my decided conviction, either here or elsewhere, that the people themselves — that is, the constituent body — have much to do, before they might or could be highly improved in their notions of their political obligations; because, though I am aware that there are some small places which ought not to send Members to this House, — and that there are temptations in those instances which make the voters often strike a balance between their personal and their political interests, — temptations so powerful that they make an appeal to the moral sense too strong for their resistance, — yet I do maintain that in all towns the constituency of which amounts to 1000, there is in that body an ample power, a numerical strength, sufficient to protect its own virtue, provided there be but the disposition. I could run over many constituencies that occur to my memory, but I will refer to one town which I had the honour to represent for many years. There are 1200 electors and upwards in the town of Colchester. Why is it that those electors, many of them opulent men, and all, perhaps, well to do, do not send Reformers to this House? Because those 1200 are not friends to Reform, but to Conservatism. Sir, it will not do to let constituencies run away with the idea that they have nothing to do, because this House — or rather some persons in this House — entertain large speculative views of reform; for, after all, those speculations lead to no practical result, — and nothing is done towards such a result, beyond the delivery of some needless speeches. But it is desirable and essentially necessary that some steps should be taken by which a Government should be formed which might conciliate and secure such a majority in this House as would be able to carry out useful measures. For my own part, I confess, I see but little difference between those who occupy the Opposition benches, and those on the Ministerial side; for I find that nearly on all great questions, whatever difference there may exist between them, it is rather in the mode of expressing their opinions than in anything else, and that they pretty nearly come to the same conclusions; therefore I hope that some experiment will be made by those country gentlemen who were in the habit, in past times, of taking part in such grave matters, and that they will now adopt means to address her Majesty, praying her Majesty to appoint such Ministers as shall possess the confidence of this House. In my judgment, I conceive that such a Ministry might be formed, for the two parties have nothing else to do than to weed their respective forces of what may be called the dead timber,—that, on the one side, they should cut off those who are so extreme in their opinions, and, on the other side, they should get rid of those who are so unmanageable;—and then I think a Government might be framed which would be capable of carrying out many useful measures. I do not say this because my attachment to reform, or my conviction of its desirableness, is in the least impaired; but I do think it far better to leave the principles of reform to work their own way, until some important and definite expression of the public mind shall be obtained for our guidance, than to waste the public time in descanting upon minor points and suggestions, which can only tend to irritate the public mind, without doing any essential service to the cause of good legislation.

COLONEL DAVIES.—If it could be proved to me that the plan proposed by the Honourable Baronet would increase the independent constituency of the counties, I assure him that it should have my strenuous support. But I cannot conceive that such would be its effect. On the contrary, I believe that the result of the adoption of that plan would be to place the 10*l.* householders in all the rural districts still more under the control of their landlords than the 50*l.* tenantry; and as the latter are found, by fatal experience, to be under complete subjection to their landlords, I feel compelled to vote against a measure which I consider calculated to place the greater number of the counties in England and Wales at the mercy of the landed aristocracy.

Mr. HUME.—Sir, I quite concur with the Right Honourable Baronet opposite, that there is no mistake, this time. The Noble Lord has spoken out distinctly, and, I will add, manfully, and has stated opinions which are very unpalatable to many who have hitherto supported him. He has distinctly told the House, that whatever may be done in the way of reform, nothing is to be expected from him—— —for the present, at least. Sir, I deeply regret the announcement of the Noble Lord, and I cannot bring myself to place much dependence on his assurance of what may, "perhaps," be done in some "future Session;" but when that Session, as the Right Honourable Baronet has observed, in reference to another question, will arrive, we do not know. What I wish to hear, and what I expected, was—an expression, not of the Noble Lord's individual opinion merely, but of that of the whole of his colleagues, and their declaration whether they mean to do anything, or what they mean to do, not prospectively, but immediately. The country has been told, elsewhere, that progressive reform is the principle on which the present Government is to proceed; and I did expect that by this time they would have been prepared to declare the extent and degree of that progressive reform which they have promised the country they would carry out. The Right Honourable Baronet has very truly declared that the speech of the Noble Lord has fixed the finality of the Reform Bill as strongly as anything that could have come from his lips. I concur in that view of the Noble Lord's speech; but I cannot bring my mind to the belief that a coalition will take place: I have a better opinion of both parties in this House. They have hitherto acted honestly in the maintenance of their several peculiar opinions, and I believe they will act so still. The time is not come when Honourable Gentlemen on either side will coalesce for the sake of carrying out their own party purposes, regardless of their former pledges. But I will pass over that, and ask my Honourable Friend if he really thinks he is correct in stating that a majority of the electors is against reform? But if that be the case, it should form one of the strongest inducements to the Government to increase and extend the franchise.

[Cries of "No, no!"]

[Laughter.]

Honourable Gentlemen may laugh; but this would be so;—because, if the Government wishes to be supported in good measures, it must be supported, and can only be supported, by the popular voice. At the present moment, when one in five ought to have a vote, there is not one in seven who has. Is it wonderful, then, to find that the working classes, and others who are excluded from the franchise, should be anxious to send men into the House who would really represent their feelings, and endeavour to procure an amelioration of their condition? The Addresses that have been recently presented to the Queen show that the people are of opinion that no man should remain in office but men who are prepared to carry out sound progressive measures of reform. I am one who think that the people are generally dissatisfied with their representatives in this House; and that they are anxious to see, not rapid, hasty, or extensive reforms taking place, at once, but that they wish and expect that her Majesty's Government, wherever they find faults and abuses existing, would proceed to remove them, and not put off the necessary reforms from Session to Session. But when the Noble Lord, or any Minister of the Crown, admits such grievances to exist under the Reform Bill as he has admitted, is it fair or reasonable to expect that the people will be satisfied to see him contentedly and quietly putting the matter by, and unwilling to apply the remedy which he himself acknowledges ought to be applied? Sir, I think the time is come when it should be clearly understood what it is the Reformers want and the people require. It is my duty, and that of my Honourable Friends around me, at all times to express our opinions openly and distinctly; and I have no hesitation in saying that it is the duty of her Majesty's Ministers to give a fair scope for the discussion of the whole question of reform to every Member of this House, and to every man in the country. Her Majesty's Ministers ought not to interfere to prevent the question of the ballot being freely discussed; official connection with the Government ought not to prevent men in this House from having an opportunity for expressing their opinions on that subject; neither should this be the case with regard to the extension of the suffrage, triennial Parliaments, or any other measure of the like kind. I do not believe that the Right Honourable Baronet will be able long to resist those questions.

[Cries of "Question!"]

I can only say, that the country will be as much grieved as I have been at the declaration of her Majesty's Ministers; and I am certain that they will find it very difficult to maintain the position they have assumed. Yet it is better that they should thus speak, than that the country should be any longer deluded. I hope that the question before the House will come to a vote, for the purpose of showing the people who are disposed to support further reforms, and who are not.

[Cries of "Divide!"]

Mr. G. H. WARD.—Sir, I am not surprised at the declaration of the Noble Lord, for it is fully justified by many events. The Noble Lord has said that his opinions have been frequently misunderstood by some, and misrepresented by other persons; but all doubts are now cleared up by the speech of the Right Honourable Baronet opposite, and the declaration of the Noble Lord himself. I deeply regret the determination to which the Noble Lord has come; but at the same time I fully admit the honesty and candour which he has exhibited, and the perfect right which he has to announce his opinions in this House; but all that I deny is, the possibility of holding together a party composed of men, two thirds of whom pass far beyond the line which has been laid down for them by the declaration of that opinion. I think that this is a question which will decide the fate of the struggle between the two parties; and I believe that Honourable Members must be ready to go to the country prepared with a full explanation of their own views, and without the least reference to the views of those who may hold the reins of government. I beg to express my intention of voting for the motion of the Honourable Baronet, because I believe it to be unexceptionable in itself, and that no valid objection can be made by the Ministers to extending the franchise to a most deserving class of people, who are qualified to receive it. I give my vote upon the merits of the question, and I beg to make this profession of my political creed,—that it is my determination to extend the franchise, whether that policy may or may not suit those who happen to be at the head of the Government. I see that the House is impatient, and I will not detain them by any further observations; but I cannot help remarking that if the decision of this question should ultimately lead to the fusion of parties, not accustomed to act together,—as has been suggested by the Honourable Member for Southwark,—the matter would, in my opinion, in reality, resolve itself into a mere question of speaking on the one side of the House or on the other. If the Reform Act is to be a final measure, with the exception of the amendments in detail which have been alluded to, and is to be the basis of the new Conservative party, I cannot see any objection to its formation on the score only of the parties who are to form it having hitherto acted in opposition to one another. The motion involves a principle and an effect more important than I at first believed to belong to it, and I sincerely trust that the Honourable Baronet will not shrink from a decision being arrived at upon it.

Mr. WAKLEY. — Sir, I will only detain the House a very short time; but I should not do justice to my own feelings if I remained entirely silent, after what has passed. First of all, I am induced to ask for what purpose the Noble Lord and his colleagues have taken office again? I should like very much to have that question answered frankly and distinctly; but I fear that unless I apply to two great ladies, not very far distant from this place, I shall have no frank, candid answer — not one, at least, that will satisfy my mind. In adopting the course which they have taken, however, I have no hesitation in saying that the Ministers are trifling with the feelings of the people of this empire, and are pursuing a course unprecedented in the history of this country; and the question which I ask I am the more provoked to put, not on account of the speech of the Noble Lord here only, but in consequence of the speech of a Noble Lord elsewhere on Friday night last. It was a good Tory speech, fit for the old times of Toryism; and, in fact, if I had read such a speech as having been made by Lord Eldon in 1818, I should not have looked twice to see whether I had mistaken the name of the person by whom it was delivered. The Noble Lord said that he hoped that the constitution, as it now stands, would work well in times of trouble and danger; but he added, that the opinion of some of the most experienced politicians of Europe was, that it might not; and that, — if it went well in fair weather, — yet, when breakers appeared and clouds hovered over the ship, some difficulties might be found in which the pilot might lose the helm, and the vessel might become a wreck. If, then, this be his opinion, and that there may be danger in going forward with the principles of reform, why is he again at the helm? Why has he again entered the vessel of the state? Why has he again taken that post, when he before declared that he could not hold it with the approbation of his shipmates? Is it possible that the Ministers can continue in office, if their only means of retaining it is the pursuit of the same course which they before adopted? I am not one of those who desire that the Noble Lord should attempt to obtain support by making promises which he intends never to fulfil. I give him all credit for the candour of his declaration; but I expected that after the speech of the Right Honourable Baronet, some Honourable Member on the Treasury bench would rise in his place and say that the Right Honourable Baronet had gone too far in binding the Noble Lord down so closely. I expected to hear the Noble Lord say, "Get up, for I did not say so, — he is binding me down too fast." The Right Honourable Baronet, however, knew the opportunity which he had for displaying his powers: he spoke with glee and delight, and he said to himself that he had got the Noble Lord into a net, and he dragged him backwards and forwards through the water until he almost drowned him — until, indeed, I was almost ready to hold an inquest over him.

[Laughter.]

There was not a single Member of the Government, however, to rise in his place and say that the Right Honourable Baronet had, in any respect, misinterpreted a single word of what fell from the Noble Lord. Then what have we to expect from the Noble Lord? Nothing. That is all; and I am not disappointed. I have got just what I expected, and no more.

With reference to a recent transaction which has taken place at the Palace, I beg to say that I approve of the conduct of Ministers in taking office, so far; and I think that they would have been wanting in their duty to the Crown and to the people, if they had neglected to make themselves responsible for the act of her Majesty. The speech of this evening necessarily carries me back to that event. I regret that an occasion of such a momentous character has been allowed to pass off in mere empty words and speeches in the House, and I regret most deeply that it has not been recorded in the Journals of the House. Sir, it is a maxim of the Tory party, and of the constitutional authorities of that party, that the Crown can do no wrong. If so, the Right Honourable Baronet, then, cannot deny that he was in the wrong.

I think that it is fair to put such an interpretation on his conduct, and on his own opinion in reference to the matter.

Digitized by Google

But should the Ministers, when they took office, have ended there? They should have gone on, and said, "We know why we lost office, and we will have a vote of this House on the subject, and we will present that vote to the Crown." Was anything of that sort done, then? There was not. I am an advocate for the monarchy and monarchical institutions, and desire to see them maintained and upheld; and I rejoice in what has been done by her Majesty, and in what has occurred with respect to the Right Honourable Baronet, because it shows us what are the peculiar qualifications of Toryism in these days. The Tories have, in fact, lost none of their grasping powers. The Right Honourable Baronet said in his own mind—(I know this was the kind of soliloquy which he held)—"Now, these foolish Whigs have thrown the ball into my hands, and I will use it to some purpose; and if I only act cautiously, I know that the Civil List and all the powers of the Crown will be at my disposal." That was the common sense of what he thought, her Majesty, however, was courageous and prudent, and acted in a manner which every Englishman must admire and esteem. She said, "I know my duty to the country, and I know that it requires me to give you full powers with respect to the construction of a Ministry; I am bound to obey the House of Commons, seeing that the constitution tells me that it is the representation of the people;" but when the Right Honourable Baronet demanded of her, her friends, ——

[Cries of "Question, question!"]

I know it is unpleasant to hear this; and if you will only be patient, you will not hear much more. The Right Honourable Baronet, however, having demanded that he should have the power of dismissing the females of her Majesty's establishment, she said, "No; I have personal rights which are consistent with the maintenance of the prerogative of the Crown, and not one of them will I part with." The Right Honourable Baronet, upon his principle, must approve of the decision to which her Majesty came; and if the Queen has reason, now, to rejoice at her Ministers having gone into office again, I would ask how long her pleasurable sensations are likely to continue? From what we have heard to-night, it might be supposed that her friends have forsaken her, and that she is about to become the Royal captive of the Tory party. It is with shame, vexation, and sorrow, that I observe the course of the Ministry. I tell them that their fate is now sealed; and it is evident to me, that, in case of a general election, the Tory party would gain a majority of sixty or seventy members.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

I believe that the fact will prove the truth of what I assert. I do not entertain a doubt upon the subject, and it will be solely attributable to the stupid course pursued by the Government. It is most unfortunate that that course should have been pursued, because I think that nothing would be more likely to secure the interests of the country, than the faithful representation of the people. The Right Honourable Baronet has said that he hated bribery and corruption in any shape; but is there any man in the kingdom, who lives out of a lunatic asylum, who can believe that the Tory party, generally, dislike intimidation and corruption?

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

You groan at me: I am glad to hear it. It shows the workings of your troubled conscience. If you are not afraid of the honest maintenance of public opinion,—if you are not opposed to the candid opinions of every voter being declared,—why not give us the only mode of manifesting those opinions? Why not give us the ballot? I wish, however, that the motion of the Honourable Baronet may be carried first, with others of the same kind. Let there be constitutional modes of voting established, and I shall not object to the ballot; but I know that in small boroughs, which belong to the two great parties, the ballot would be as decided a shield to bribery as it would be for fair voting in general. Whatever may be the end of this motion, however, I am satisfied that, at no distant period, the country will demand that her interests should be attended to, and her rights granted; and whatever the powers of this House may be, they will be unable to resist the demands of the people of the United Kingdom.

Mr. SLANEY.—Sir, I have heard with great satisfaction the declaration of the Noble Lord. From the earliest period I have voted for reform; and, in my honest opinion, I believe the Noble Lord has done himself honour by the way in which he has acted on this question. After having voted with the Noble Lord for a long time, it would have been with deep regret had I been obliged, conscientiously, to vote against him. After a final settlement has been made of the great question of reform, when many concessions have been made by public men, I regret to see these endeavours to unsettle and enlarge it. I am glad to see that the present Ministry are not forgetful of the best interests of the country, and are not disposed to break down this great measure for the sake of retaining office. I believe that the great majority of the country is satisfied with the system of reform as it now stands, with such alterations and changes as the Noble Lord will not be unwilling to grant. For myself, I look for nothing from any Government; but I declare honestly, in my place, as a Member of this House, that I think the Noble Lord has done himself the greatest credit by the manly and straightforward declaration he has made, in spite of the censure to which it will expose him.

Mr. P. H. HOWARD. — It appears to me that if this concession were made to the county voters, without likewise extending a concession to the voters in towns, no permanent satisfaction would be derived. During the long progress of the Reform Bill, I voted with the Noble Lord (Lord J. Russell), and I then heard that "the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill" was acceptable to the country. If there were any other reason for inducing me to stand by the Noble Lord on this occasion, it would be this, — that he covets not the ignominy of certain of his friends around him.

[Cries of "Order!"]

SIR H. FLEETWOOD. — It would have been my wish and feeling, if I had it in my power, seeing the feeling of the House, to withdraw my motion; but I felt when a Member had given notice of a motion it was his duty to come to a discussion of it. I am now anxious to withdraw the motion.

[Loud cries of "No!"]

If, however, the House wishes to proceed to a division, I think it but fair and proper to put a statement right which has been misinterpreted on the part of the Noble Lord (Lord J. Russell). I certainly understood the Noble Lord to say that his opinions coincided with my own on the present motion, but that in the present Session he could give it no support, and could not promise to give any support to the motion in any future Session. Now, I am satisfied no one could be led to consider that the Noble Lord hereby pledged himself to oppose it on any future occasion.

The House then divided: — Ayes 81; Noes 207; — Majority against bringing in the Bill, 126.

AYES.

CORONERS.

SIR HESKETH FLEETWOOD moved for leave to bring in a Bill to limit the time of taking the polls at elections of coroners for counties to one day, and for increasing the number of polling places.

On the question being put, —

Mr. WAKLEY said:—I will merely observe, that experience has already shown me there are many alterations requisite to be made in the election of coroners, and which may be made, without reference to any party or political feeling of any kind. There are many excrescences in the present law to prune, and many things to add. As the proposed Bill extends but to the removal of one, only, of the evils connected with the office, the change in itself would be nothing unless we were also to specify who were to be coroners, and made some reference to the qualification of voters. Under all the circumstances, as this measure would only amount to the removal of a very trifling amount of the existing evils, I do hope that the question will be left to another Session, and I promise I will employ as much industry as I can for the purpose of discovering what ought to be done with reference to the office, and will give the measure every aid in my power.

Mr. PAKINGTON. — I agree with the Honourable Member that the Bill ought not to be brought in at this period of the Session; and, moreover, I think that the Bill brought in by the Honourable Baronet is by no means sufficient to meet the required alterations with regard to the election of coroners. I quite agree with the Honourable Member for Finsbury that several alterations are needed. The Bill does not go near far enough.

Mr. J. JERVIS. — I hope that the Honourable Baronet will proceed, so that the Bill may be printed; and Honourable Members can then see what its provisions are.

Mr. C. WYNN. — I certainly think it is inexpedient to legislate in this partial manner on a question involving so many details. There ought to be some intelligible qualification established for voters; and until that be done, it seems quite absurd to attempt to bring in any motion.

SIR H. FLEETWOOD. — I wish, first of all, to have the Bill brought in and printed, that it may be circulated throughout the country, and that I may by that means be enabled to receive suggestions relating to it. But if I then see no expectation of carrying the Bill this Session, I will adopt the suggestion of the Honourable Member for Finsbury, and withdraw it for the present.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL. — I hope the Honourable Baronet will not press the Bill in the present Session.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — It is admitted that there are many evils attendant on the present system of coroners. Attempts have been made to introduce some general plan of reform in the system, and have failed. The Bill of the Honourable Baronet deals with only one prominent evil, and I think he should be allowed to bring it in.

The Bill was then ordered to be brought in by SIR HESKETH FLEETWOOD and Mr. O'CONNELL.

REGISTRY OF ELECTORS.

Mr. EWART. — Sir, I have given notice of a motion for leave to bring in a Bill to render the registration of electors final; but as the Honourable Member for Ipswich has introduced a Bill which differs only in some slight particulars from that which I had prepared, I hope to be able to arrange those points of difference with the Honourable Member; and I therefore will not now press my motion. The Bill I proposed to introduce would enact, first, that the registry of electors should be final until the next visit of the revising barristers; and, next, that no committee of the House of Commons should be allowed to enter into any question involving the disqualification of a voter, unless such question had been previously mooted before the revising barrister.

DUNMOW UNION WORK-HOUSE.

SIR J. TYRELL presented petitions, praying that this House will in nowise interfere with the order of the Poor Law Commissioners for the erection of the union workhouse at Great Dunmow, — from Dunmow (magistrates and guardians of the Dunmow union); and clergy, gentry, and others of the Dunmow union. — To lie on the table.

Mr. WAKLEY. — I will move that the order for the motion of which I have given notice on this subject be discharged, for the purpose of bringing forward one differently worded, to which the Government do not object. I will now move that there be laid before the House — "Copies of any communications to or from the Poor Law Commissioners concerning the erection of a workhouse in the union of Dunmow." As it is the wish of my Honourable Friends around me that I should not enter, now, into the statement which it was my intention to make, I beg leave to postpone it until the papers I have moved for are before the House.

SIR J. TYRELL. — The workhouse in question is only half finished. It is insured for 2000*l.*, and must, by the contract, be finished in September. The ratepayers, might, therefore, be very much inconvenienced if any further postponement of this question on the part of the House now took place.

Mr. WAKLEY. — No delay is intended. Government have agreed to the production of the papers.

The motion was agreed to.

EDUCATION — CALL OF THE HOUSE.

LORD ASHLEY. — I rise, Sir, pursuant to the notice I have given, to move that the House be called over on Friday, the 14th instant. I believe I am relieved from any fear of opposition to the motion, by the fact that the Noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department has avowed his intention of seconding it.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I rise to second the motion, as I have already stated my intention of doing. I will take the same opportunity to assign some reasons why I conceive the House should not be influenced by statements in petitions on this subject, no doubt honestly intended, but totally at variance with the plan proposed by the Committee of the Privy Council. One prevailing error is, the assumption that the plan proposed is intended to apply uniformly to all parishes throughout the kingdom. In each school that is to be established, it is proposed that the persons to be educated in it are not merely to be day scholars, but that they are to live in the house. Therefore, it is obvious that neither the system of the National School Society, nor that of the British and Foreign School Society, will be applicable to this plan. Under the National Society plan, any child educated must belong to the established church; and thus it necessarily becomes an exclusive school, and those who would send individuals to be taught at them must be aware that they will be under this exclusive system. If you take the British and Foreign School system, under which the children receive instruction in reading the Scriptures, and also religious instruction, either from the established church, or in conformity with the tenets of the religious societies to which their parents belong, that is open to other objections. I have always belonged to the British and Foreign School Society, and I am proud and gratified at my connection with it. By the plan of that society, it is provided that the Scriptures shall be read in the schools belonging to it, and the children shall, on the Sunday, attend divine worship at the church, or attend at the peculiar place of worship of their parents; and, also, that all the children shall receive religious instruction one day in the week, in conformity with the religion of their parents. This system, it is obvious, cannot apply to children remaining in the school all the week, and not being under immediate parental superintendence; it has, therefore, been thought necessary, in the plan that has been prepared, that we should direct the appointment of a chaplain of the established church, and that provision also be made that the children of Dissenters shall be instructed in the peculiar religious tenets of their parents. It has been assumed that this is the system which is to be established throughout the country. Now, as neither the principle of the National Society, nor that of the British and Foreign School Society, will apply in the proposed schools, so neither can the plan that has been alluded to apply all over the country. According to the rule of the National School Society, all the children must attend divine worship, with the master of the school, at the parish church on Sundays; but I think that the rule on the same subject which has been adopted by the British and Foreign School Society is more fair and extensive in its operation.

But another feeling has gone abroad, which is a most mistaken one, and has arisen from an erroneous view that has been taken of a few words occurring in the Report of the Committee of the Privy Council. It has been said, with respect to the children of Roman Catholics, that they will be allowed to use their own version of the Bible. From this it has been inferred that there are to be new versions of the Bible used in their schools; and it is also assumed that they are to be generally used. Now, although there is not such a great difference between these two versions of the Bible as has been described, still I am aware that objections may be urged on the assumption that two versions of the Scriptures are to be commonly used. But in the way in which the plan is proposed in the Report of the Committee of the Privy Council, it is not open to any such objection. The principle that it is proposed to act upon is by no means a new one; for it has already received the sanction of this House and the Legislature in an important enactment. It is enacted in the Poor Law Amendment Act, that, in the workhouses, the pauper children shall be assembled in a school and instructed; and that Act also provides that each child shall receive instruction in the peculiar religion professed by its parents. Now, if any of the inmates of the workhouses shall happen to be Roman Catholics having children, those children of Roman Catholic parents will require Roman Catholic teachers to attend them, who, of course, will bring with them Roman Catholic books of instruction; and I am not aware that this has been objected to. I therefore think that the outcry which has been raised on this point has arisen out of a completely mistaken view of the subject: and when I say this, I will also observe that there are several other points on which the instructions of the Committee of the Privy Council have been completely misunderstood, — I will not say misrepresented, — but misunderstood so completely as to put an effectual stop to the plan proposed by the Committee of the Privy Council. After this misunderstanding, and after the effect which it has produced, I arrived at the conclusion that it would be unadvisable to pursue the proposed plan further at present. The most excessive eagerness has been manifested in opposition to the system; and the zeal of the opponents of it has been carried to an extent that I cannot account for. I have this day received a letter, informing me that a clergyman actually read a petition against the plan at the conclusion of his sermon, and called upon his congregation to sign it. I have also received the copy of a petition which is described to be against the Government plan, — "for expelling religious instruction from the schools of this country." Now, this can only have arisen from a perverse anxiety to exclude the public from forming a correct notion of the plan; for a want of religious instruction cannot, with any fairness, be said to be one of the objections to it.

It has also been observed that another objection to it is, that when the children are receiving together general instruction under the same roof, from the several religious teachers imparting instruction in their peculiar tenets and doctrines to the children respectively belonging to their various sects, there will be a tendency to shake a steadfastness of belief, and render doubtful their convictions in the doctrines of their own churches. I will not say whether or not this is a valid objection to the plan, or whether it is open to any such objection; but I must say, that the zeal that has been manifested on this point is most extraordinary, when taken in contrast with the practical infidelity which has prevailed for so long a period on the part of many of those persons on this subject. If reference be made to the Reports of the inspectors of prisons, it will be seen that it often happens that forty or fifty persons are found in a gaol who can neither read nor write, and many others who cannot repeat the Lord's Prayer, or who, knowing it, cannot attach any common meaning to it, or give an answer to the most simple questions as to the doctrines of the Christian religion. When I recollect the state of the classes most subject to the criminal law, and who are most severely punished for any offence against society, — and when I know that such a large portion of them have not been taught the simplest elements of religion and morals, and when questioned by the chaplains of the prisons, have hardly known of the existence of a God, or of the doctrine of the death of Jesus Christ, — I should not have been surprised if such zeal as has been shown against this plan had been manifested against this lamentable want of instruction. I do hope that, while this plan, which has been so much misunderstood, and which has, unjustly, brought so much obloquy on the Government, is withdrawn, the principle of instruction which it involves will not be allowed to sleep. I hope that the zeal for religious instruction will continue; and that all those who stand in need of it may derive the benefit of education, whatever may be their religious creed. Although the Government may have suffered from the attacks made on it, in consequence of bringing forward this plan, I still shall rejoice if it can be turned to a useful purpose, and promote the moral and religious instruction of the people, in connection with the peculiar doctrines of those zealous persons who now appear so anxious to promote education in that way. I shall willingly bear all the odium that has been cast on the plan, if the result be that the extent of ignorance which now unhappily prevails can be diminished; and that those classes of persons who are, at present, reared in ignorance have an opportunity afforded them of learning their duties to God and man. I repeat that, under the circumstances, it is not the intention of the Government to persist in the proposal to found the normal school. I shall be prepared, when the proper time arrives, to go into a statement on the Report of the Committee of the Privy Council; and I shall then propose the vote of which I have given notice; and I shall also propose that it be divided, as at present, between the National School Society and the British and Foreign School Society: but, in agreeing to this plan for the present, I feel bound to observe that I am by no means satisfied to leave the matter as it is, and to give the control of the education to two voluntary societies, which may have very imperfect and defective plans of education, that may be open to the most serious objections. I am glad that increased attention has been devoted to this question since I addressed my constituents on the subject in 1837; and I trust that all classes will look to a more general diffusion of the blessings of education. In conclusion, I will only add that, in the first place, I am satisfied that it is the duty of the House and the Legislature to promote the instruction of all classes of the community; and, secondly, that, in doing so, they should not confine themselves to any exclusive system of instruction. These two principles will, I trust, be adhered to; and, in seconding the motion of the Noble Lord opposite, I will leave the Noble Lord to follow the course he may think best, after the production of the papers. I have much pleasure in seconding the motion of the Noble Lord.

Mr. GOULBURN. — During the whole time I have held a seat in Parliament I have never known so extraordinary a course taken as that which has been adopted by the Noble Lord. It is, indeed, most extraordinary that the Noble Lord should have taken this opportunity for entering into a discussion of one of the most important subjects that can possibly come under the consideration of the House. The Noble Lord, if I understood him rightly, tells the House that he has entirely abandoned the plan which, no longer ago than last Friday night, he appeared so confident of bringing forward, — judging by the readiness which the Noble Lord had shown in saying that he would second the motion of his Noble Friend the Member for Dorsetshire. The Noble Lord has, in seconding the motion for calling the House together, in order that the subject may be fully discussed, taken the opportunity of making an attack on the objections of those who are conscientiously opposed to the Government plan, and of throwing out insinuations — to use no stronger term — with respect to the persons who have petitioned against it. Now, I have been intrusted with a petition from the University which I have the honour to represent, and also with petitions from various other places, against the Government scheme of education, as that is collected, from the papers which were laid before the House a few days ago; and although I have not yet found an opportunity of presenting them to the House, I can tell the Noble Lord that the persons who have signed those petitions are as capable of understanding the plan as the Noble Lord himself. On looking to the number of petitions that have been presented against the resolutions recently laid on the table, I am prepared to say that the persons who signed them understand those resolutions as I understand them, and that they concur in the objections which have been urged against them in this House. I certainly do not think this is a time to go into a discussion of the subject; but I consider that it would have been more fair of the Noble Lord, if he had given some notice of his intention to do so, instead of entering on the discussion so unexpectedly.

There is one part of the Noble Lord's speech which I feel myself compelled to answer, — and that is, with reference to the neglect with which some persons are charged on the subject of education. Now, if I were disposed to impute to one party more than another a want of zeal in bringing forward some plan of education to supply the great deficiency of it that at present exists, I do not think that imputation would rest on the party who oppose the Government plan. Have there not been large public meetings in almost every part of the country for reforming the present defective system, which is the more strongly felt owing to the great want of religious instruction? And have not those numerous meetings preceded the motion of the Noble Lord? I quite agree with the Noble Lord in deploring the evils which arise from defective education, and in saying that it is lamentable to see the ignorance of the great truths of religion that is shown by many of the lower classes of society. There are many cases in which the opportunities of instruction that have been afforded are rendered ineffectual, either from the conduct of the parents of those unhappy persons, or from the habitual aversion of youth to receive it; but these are the consequences of ignorance rather than proof of a defect of attention on the part of those religious instructors under whom these persons are placed. As to myself, I certainly must say that I consider all education as good for nothing which does not comprise religious instruction. The plan, however, proposed by the Government, — I mean the one now lying on the table of the House, — in my opinion, tends greatly to encourage a general laxity of religious principles; and, entertaining this opinion, I cannot possibly approve of it. I will not trouble the House with any further observations on the subject; but my only object in rising was to observe, that the speech of the Noble Lord was entirely unexpected by me, as I believe it to have been by many other Honourable Members.

Mr. HUME. — I regret that the Noble Lord has been obliged to give up his plan; but after the misrepresentations which have gone forth respecting it, I was not wholly unprepared for such a result. The members of the Church of England, instead of supporting this plan, have manifested the utmost opposition to it, and stated that they are most anxious for the extension of education in connection with the church; but I believe that their conduct is influenced by a design of maintaining the present state of ignorance throughout the country. I recollect that when I was a member of the committee of the Lancasterian Society, some years ago, the clergy used every exertion to put it down; and when they found that they could not do so, they started another society; and I am convinced that, if at that time the Lancasterian Society had come to Parliament for a grant of money, they would have been met as the present plan has been. The clergy have ample means and sufficient resources to educate all classes; but they have entirely neglected that duty. The clergy are amply paid for the instruction of the people, and all the evils that have arisen from withdrawing it have resulted from the allowance of pluralities and non-residence. I contend, therefore, that the Church of England is answerable for the prevalence of the ignorance and crime that exist in this country to such a frightful extent. After all my experience, however, I hardly thought that the plan would have been treated in the manner in which it has been. I am sorry that the discussion has not come on respecting the plan; for if it had, an opportunity would have been afforded of exposing and doing away with many of the objections that have been urged against it, and thus the feeling that has been excited throughout the country would have been allayed. Nothing can be more absurd and monstrous than some of the opinions that have been put forward in some of the petitions presented to the House. I have seen, in one petition which has been presented from 439 schoolmasters against the Bill, an observation to the effect, that they would rather see the children die in ignorance than have them educated under the proposed plan. What can be expected, when we see such a remark emanate from those who are regarded as instructors? I hope the people of England will loudly demand that justice be done to them; and I think it is entirely owing to the scandalous neglect of the heads of the church establishment, which is so richly endowed for the purposes of education, that such ignorance prevails; and therefore they ought to be the foremost to support the Government in the plan it has proposed.

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — I merely rise to reply to some of the observations of the Right Honourable Member for the University of Cambridge, and to say that, in my humble judgment, at least, the proceeding of my Noble Friend the Secretary for the Home Department is not at all open to the reproof it has received. On the contrary, my Noble Friend was right to take the first opportunity that is offered by any motion to inform Parliament in due time of the course he means to pursue, and to refute and contradict the offensive, mendacious misrepresentations —— that have been made with respect to the Government plan, through so many different channels. Why, Honourable Members cannot take up a single daily or weekly newspaper, without finding endless misrepresentations made of this plan. My Noble Friend is not forestalling any discussion on the subject which is to take place according to previous notice, because he has stated that, in deference to the opinion expressed by the country, he does not intend to press his present plan on the House. I hope that the country may form a more deliberate opinion upon the subject, and that there may be adopted, at some future time, a plan of universal education; for I trust this question is only delayed for the present. My Noble Friend, however, I am happy to think, is resolved to obtain as much education for the people as possible; and for that purpose he will still call upon the House for a grant of 30,000*l.* for the purposes of national education, which shall be distributed by the two societies named by my Noble Friend, — but possibly under some better and different modifications of the system upon which those societies act at present. When the Right Honourable Member says that he thinks education is good for nothing without religious instruction, and that the present plan tends greatly to produce a laxity of religious principles, he must forget that both the speech of my Noble Friend, and also the plan laid down by the Committee of the Privy Council, are most emphatic and expressive in the contradiction of such results being intended by the present plan: in neither is there the slightest ground for such an assumption.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL. — This is the first time that I have ever heard a Minister of the Crown venture to designate such petitions as "mendacious and offensive."

[Loud cries of "No, no!" and, "Hear, hear!"]

I appeal to the House, whether such observations have not been applied, by the Noble Lord, to the petitions sent to the House on the subject of the Government plan of education?

[Cries of "No, no!"]

If I am wrong, the Noble Lord will have an opportunity of setting me right, and of doing away with an impression which his observations have made on my mind, as well as, I believe, on the minds of other Honourable Members. I understood the expressions of the Noble Lord to be to the effect that I have described.

says that this is a church question, and insinuates that the petitions which have been presented, praying the House not to agree to the plan of education proposed by her Majesty's Ministers, have been got up through the agency of the clergy. I will ask whether the Wesleyan Methodists are connected with the church? — yet that most respectable body of Dissenters have, una voce, declared against the adoption of this plan. The petitions that have been presented express the opinions of a large portion of the people of England; and it is in consequence of this that the Noble Lord has not thought proper to submit the proposed plan to the consideration of Parliament. My Noble Friend has moved for a call of the House, in expectation of this subject coming on, on Friday, the 14th; and after what fell from the Noble Lord the other night, it was generally believed that there would be no objection to the motion. It was thought that the Noble Lord would have seconded the motion in the regular and proper manner.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and, "Oh, oh!"]

Ay, in the regular and proper manner, for I contend that the Noble Lord has been most irregular in proceeding to discuss a motion which it was understood was to be unopposed, and which might have come on in the early part of the evening. This is an unopposed motion, and nobody expected that the Noble Lord would have made a speech on the subject of education.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

I will appeal to the House whether it is not generally understood that when my Noble Friend proposed his motion for the call of the House, and when the Noble Lord gave notice of his intention of seconding it, — whether it was not generally understood that it was to be unopposed? It may, however, be thought that the Noble Lord availed himself of the absence of the Right Honourable Member for Tamworth, — who, probably, would have answered him had he been present, — and has taken the opportunity of explaining his reasons for abandoning his proposed plan, in what I must designate as not either a very clear or a very distinct explanation.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and, "Oh, oh!"]

It will be said that the Noble Lord availed himself of such an opportunity of abandoning the plan which was to give education without religious instruction. I do not believe that this was the intention of the Noble Lord, or of those who act with him, in proposing the plan; but such, certainly, is the belief of many with regard to the plan, and the course that has been pursued will certainly lead to that opinion throughout the country. This opinion has been formed on seeing that the whole control of the general education of the country is to be left to a Committee of the Privy Council, and not a single ecclesiastic is a member of this body! It may be said that there are to be chaplains to these schools who are ministers of the church; but these are all subordinate officers under the control of the Committee of Privy Council. In a body so constituted, in the present circumstances of the country, there will be little confidence, — and, above all, when the situation is recollected in which they are placed. I agree in all that has fallen from my Right Honourable Friend near me, and only regret that the present course has been taken. I, at present, understand, from what has fallen from the Noble Lord, that his proposition will be, that the 80,000*l.* which he intends to propose we should vote shall be expended under the superintendence of the two societies to which the pecuniary grants have, hitherto, been made. If this be the case, I believe that there will be no very serious opposition to the plan. I felt bound to rise after the observations which have fallen from a Noble Lord, and which I understood in the sense I have stated; but if I am under an erroneous impression, I shall feel happy in being corrected.

LORD MORPETH. — I rise to offer one word in explanation. I think I can remember the terms of which I made use. They were the words "mendacious and offensive;" but I will not retract them, as I applied them only to the misrepresentations that have been made through so many different channels, and I in no way applied them to petitions, nor had I, indeed, at the time I used them, any idea of petitions in my mind.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL. — I regret that the Noble Lord has not stated the channels to which he did allude, as I cannot understand to what he alluded, if not to the petitions that have been presented.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — I cannot help remarking that the Right Honourable Baronet has manifested a singular talent for totally misunderstanding the language and observations of my Noble Friend, otherwise he would not have so completely misrepresented what has taken place. I am quite satisfied that no other person who has listened to the speech of my Noble Friend can have supposed that the observations he made applied to those who have signed the petitions against the proposed plan. I think that the term "mendacious misrepresentation" was most properly applied to those parties who got up the excitement that has prevailed, with the view of deceiving others, and inducing feelings of opposition to the plan, and with the view of leading persons to sign their petitions. With reference, also, to what has fallen from my Noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, nothing can be less improper or unfair than for him to explain the nature of the vote he intends to propose, when he seconds the motion for a call of the House, and to say that he does not intend to press the plan which has been the means of exciting such a feeling as he has described. Could anything be more fair on the part of my Noble Friend, than to provide that, previously to the House coming to a vote, there should be no misapprehension as to the nature of the motion which he intends to make? What does my Noble Friend gain by the course that he has pursued? He has merely explained the feelings that have induced him to abandon his plan, and to propose a vote somewhat different. So far from this being unfair, it gives an opportunity to Honourable Gentlemen opposite to consider what answer they shall give to his statement, or to the proposition that will be grounded on it. The Right Honourable Baronet states that this is an unopposed motion, and that it might have been made at the beginning of the evening; and that it is, therefore, irregular for my Noble Friend to make any observations on seconding the motion of the Noble Lord. Is the Right Honourable Baronet aware that it often happens that unopposed motions are discussed for hours? What is more common than to debate the most important questions of foreign policy, on motions for papers, to the production of which there is not the slightest objection? The course, therefore, pursued by my Noble Friend is entirely in conformity with the proceedings of the House. Considering the manner in which the plan of education has been misrepresented and misstated, the complaint of unfairness made against my Noble Friend appears to me to be most extraordinary and uncalled for, as he was only anxious to give the most ample notice of the views and manner in which the Government intend to proceed.

Mr. LITTON. — I feel that, as the country has been alarmed from one end to the other at the announcement of the proposed plan of education, we are justified in expecting the fullest explanation from the Noble Lord. It has been stated that the feeling that prevails has been the result of the misstatements and misrepresentations which have been put forward on the subject. If this be the case, why does the Noble Lord shrink from a full discussion of the plan, and from showing that the objections that have been urged against it have been the result of misrepresentations and party feelings? Those Honourable Members who sit on this side of the House had a right to expect that an opportunity of fully discussing the plan would be afforded to them; and when the Noble Lord stated, on Thursday last, that he would second the motion of my Noble Friend for a call of the House, I will ask whether it was not the belief of every man, here, that he was prepared to justify the plan which he had announced, and to take the sense of the House on the subject? There can be no mistake as to this plan. It is a plan for mingling up in one common school the children of the Socinian, the member of the Church of England, and the Roman Catholic. The mixture of children of all religious persuasions would not fail to destroy every principle of elementary religion whatever. I deny that the representations which have been made by the opponents of the Government scheme, whether in or out of this House, are mendacious. The statements which have been made from this side of the House are strictly true, and express the opinions of all who have any religion in their hearts. I challenge discussion on the question, and then let it be judged who is wrong and who is right. The Noble Lord has heard some severe remarks on his conduct with regard to this measure; and while he and others pursue similar plans, — while their measures go to destroy all true religion, — he will hear observations still more "offensive." Of all the bad measures brought forward by her Majesty's Government, I firmly believe this is the worst. It strikes at the root of the morals and religion of the country, and will tend to the destruction of civil and religious freedom.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — The Honourable and Learned Gentleman entertains very peculiar notions; for he maintains that if the children of parents holding different opinions in religion, are educated together, the result of the entire scheme will be the production of a kind of negative quantity, and end in no religion at all. There is no country in Europe where the children of different persuasions are not educated together. Let us look at the Report of Mr. Nicholls on the state of Belgium and Holland, and we shall find the Calvinist, the Lutheran, and the Roman Catholic educated together in amity and perfect good faith. This is the spirit which ought to exist between Christians, and forms a cheering contrast to that bigotry which allows no freedom of thought, and grasps at everything. The Church of England is the richest national church in Europe, and it is the church which, of all others, has contributed the least to education; and it is a lasting disgrace to her, that of all countries in Europe, England alone should have no system of national education. The Right Honourable Member for the University of Cambridge maintains that the Church of England does educate the people; but what does he mean by that? Will the Right Honourable Gentleman educate Dissenters or Roman Catholics? No, he will not! Yet the 30,000*l.* proposed to be voted for education, is not the money of the established church, any more than it is the money of the Independents, Baptists, or of any other religious sect; for it comes as much out of their pockets as it does from the pockets of members of the Church of England. It is as much the money of the Dissenters as it is theirs. Yet, what is the public outcry and clamour which have been raised, except that no part of that public money shall be expended towards the support of any system of national education which is not founded on the principles of the established church? I declare such a plea to be bigoted and unjust. If you permit only one version of the Scriptures to be read at the public schools, children, when they are grown up, will find they have been deceived. Besides, I will ask, what harm can the perusal of the different versions produce? All that was formerly insisted on, was, that the Roman Catholics should read the Bible. But now that the Roman Catholics are ready to do so, by the adoption of the Government plan, their opponents turn round and say, they shall not be allowed to read their own Bible. I do not wish the Roman Catholic version to be put into the hands of any except Roman Catholic children. To ask for more, would certainly be unjust and unfair. All that I ask is, perfect equality for all children — to be educated as children of that special persuasion which their parents follow, — that the children of parents of the Church of England shall be educated in the principles of that church — Dissenters according to their particular tenets, — and the Roman Catholics according to theirs. I will ask, which is the most numerous persuasion? The Roman Catholic is the most numerous in the British isles. We have seven millions in Ireland, and two millions in England; and I beg to add, they are not diminishing in numbers. Yet Honourable Members opposite wish that this numerous and increasing class shall be shut out from the benefit of their own money. What is the cause of this? Are they afraid to let the Roman Catholics have the benefit of education? Do they wish to keep them in ignorance, that they may be the more easily converted? This is a narrow and most singular course, for in all other countries the children of all persuasions are educated together on a footing of equality. The clergy of the established church have availed themselves of this opportunity to raise the old "No Popery" cry, without any justifiable reason. I am sorry to hear that the Noble Lord intends to abandon his plan, and that he proposes to give public money to voluntary societies. Those societies will allow none but the legalised versions of the Bible authorised by law to be read at their schools, so that such a scheme will practically exclude the Roman Catholics from all benefit. I protest against the appropriation of the public money to such purposes, and think that the public at large ought to have the benefit fairly and freely.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — The fact is, the Noble Lord opposite is always seizing an opportunity of politically shuffling out of a difficulty; but I can tell him, these tricks will no longer serve him, as the eyes of the country are at last open to them.

Mr. SLANEY. — Sir, I very much regret that the tone of the discussion has partaken of party acerbity. I cannot think that the Noble Lord is liable to any censure for abandoning a plan, against which, whether owing to misrepresentation or not, the opinion of the country has been expressed. At the same time, I cannot acquit Honourable Gentlemen on this side of the House of having used harsh expressions. The Honourable Member for Kilkenny has said that the ignorance of the people was to be attributed to the clergy of the established church; and against that assertion I feel myself bound to protest. It may be that, in common with other members of society, they may not have made any great exertions in the cause of education, but they have always been foremost in giving their aid whenever called on. But the question is, whether we ought not to consider what is proper to be done on the present occasion. I admit that the National Society has done a great deal for the education of the people; but that society cannot be sufficient for a ll the purposes required.

GENERAL JOHNSON.—I rise to order. There is a great deal of business on the paper, and it is improper for the Honourable Member to discuss a question not regularly before the House.

The SPEAKER.—The House has certainly wandered from the question; but still I cannot say that I see any ground for the interference of the Chair.

Mr. SLANEY.—I only intended further to observe, that the National School Society, and the British and Foreign Society, enable the Dissenters to have a good education; and I hope that, by the means of these two societies, and the assistance afforded them, much greater bodies of the people of the country will receive the advantages of education. With respect to the Roman Catholics, I think a plan might be devised to which liberal men belonging to the established church would not object.

Mr. GODSON.—It certainly is most extraordinary that not only the Members who sit on this side of the House, but almost all who have read the minutes of the Committee of the Privy Council, should construe them in a different sense from that in which they were intended. Many of my constituents feel a deep interest in the question; and I trust that, as the published plan is to be abandoned, the Noble Lord will speedily enable the House to judge of that which is intended to be brought forward as a substitute.

Mr. WYSE.—Sir, I, for one, must protest against the withdrawing of the published plan. I object, and have always objected, to the appropriation of the public money to any particular society. I have protested, on all occasions, against every arrangement by which such societies were to be understood as standing in the place of the nation. I trust the Noble Lord will consider, in any measure he may bring forward, that he is standing as the representative of the Government at large in this matter; and whether, by giving money to these societies, he will not, in fact, be giving a bonus to maintain political and religious ascendancy? I hope the Noble Lord will consider that, by his proceeding on the principle he has now stated, he will be excluding a large part of the community, and more especially the lower classes of the Roman Catholic persuasion, from the benefit of education. I hope, then, that the Noble Lord will yet recur to his former plan, from which he has been driven by the mistaken clamour that has been raised against it. I know that many petitions have been presented against that plan, and I know, also, the unfair means that have been used to get up those petitions. I have, at this moment, in my possession, a petition in favour of the Government scheme, in which it is stated that the signature of the petitioner was extorted to a petition against the measure, as he was coming out of a church, by leading him to believe that he was petitioning in its favour.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and laughter from the Opposition benches.]

I do not believe that the real sense of the people of England has been ascertained on these matters, or that, if appealed to, it would be found to be really hostile to a scheme of national education on liberal principles. I, myself, have presented petitions signed by 80,000 persons of the North of England in favour of the Government measure, a year ago, and I see no reason to induce me to believe that these persons have since changed their minds on the subject. I regret that the Noble Lord has not given more time to enable the public mind to be rightly informed as to the principle of the Government scheme; and still further, that the Noble Lord did not, last year, when the public attention was directed to the subject, take such steps as would have enabled the Government to bring their scheme forward supported by resolutions of this House. As to any obstacles that may be thrown in the way of a system of national education, based on free and comprehensive principles, I say, fearlessly, that it is not in the power of Honourable Members opposite to stop its progress. It is not a question whether the system of education to be given to the people shall be ruled by Catholics, by Wesleyan Methodists, or by any other sect. But it is a question whether there shall be "knowledge" in the country; whether the people shall be educated, or not; and I am sorry to say that I believe there are many persons who, under the cloak of religion, are desirous to stop the advance of instruction altogether. I have no objection to the establishment of separate schools, so that the children of different religious persuasions may be instructed separately; but what I do aim at is, that, together with religious instruction, which I, in common with others, desire to see imparted, —that sound intellectual and moral education should be extended to the children of every religious persuasion, which all have an equal right to expect. I am gratified, however, at one result that has followed the agitation upon this question. I am glad to find that it has occasioned what is termed an "awakening" of the Church of England; that that church, which has remained so long "speechless," has at length roused herself from her lethargy. I do not charge the Church of England with negligence on the subject of education, upon my own authority alone. I do so upon the statement of reverend and learned doctors, who admit that the church has not taken sufficient charge of the instruction of the people. High authorities in that church have stated that they would not attend even once a week to the religious instruction of their people, if it were not specially enjoined as a part of their duty. A Roman Catholic priest might, with some propriety, perhaps, have said something of that sort; but the ground of the Reformation, the great principle inculcated by Luther, was that it was a duty which all ought to discharge — the teaching of the poor and lowly. How the church has neglected that duty, the history of this country fully demonstrates. But it has at length awakened. I am glad of it; I rejoice at it: I am more glad, perhaps, at that awakening, than some members of the Church of England themselves. I augur much good from that increased activity. I believe it will be productive of much good. If the people of this country were sufficiently instructed, we should not have to witness such deplorable scenes as those which have taken place lately in Kent and elsewhere, and which exhibit in a strong light the evil effects of a church slumbering in its duty of attending to the general education of the people. I do not wish to carry the discussion further at present. But I must again enter my protest against granting the public money to any of the national schools, whether to the British and Foreign, or to the National, to the exclusion of others. I am anxious that all schools and classes should have the benefit of the public money, without distinction of sect or creed.

AN HONOURABLE MEMBER. — I think the Noble Lord opposite (Lord John Russell) must now be aware of the great inconvenience of taking a discussion upon a question like this on a motion for a call of the House. The House is now informed that the original plan is to be given up and a new one substituted. I hope the Noble Lord will make a full statement of what the exact nature of this new scheme is, before we are called upon to decide upon it; for much of the misrepresentation with which we have been charged with regard to the plan now abandoned is to be attributed to our not having had an explicit statement before, of what the Noble Lord's intentions really were. I think, also, that however much the Noble Lord may have to complain of our misunderstanding and misrepresentation on our parts, we have, at least, an equal right to complain that, on all occasions when this question of education is mooted in the House, whether directly or indirectly, we are charged by Honourable Members opposite with entertaining feelings of hostility towards all schools except those of the established church, and with a wish to prevent the children of other religious persuasions from receiving instruction. I hope, whenever the discussion upon the question shall take place, that the Noble Lord will endeavour to show that the misrepresentations of which he has complained have been made, not by this or that newspaper, but by persons who have taken part in these discussions, and also that the plan has actually been misrepresented. I trust, also, that he will be prepared to justify the accusation which he has made of dilatory neglect on the part of the church, in order that the friends of the church may have an opportunity of replying to the charge.

LORD ASHLEY. — I will not detain the House more than a few moments; but I wish to take this opportunity of saying one word. When the Noble Lord gave notice that he would second my motion, I think it would have been more courteous to the House if he had stated that he would take that opportunity of withdrawing his former plan, and had entered then into a statement of what he calls the misrepresentations which have been urged against the Government measure. I think, too, that it is but fair that he should give us a full opportunity of discussing this question, and of examining the documents which he has laid on the table of the House. When, however, the Noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland uses such terms as he has thought fit to use, throwing into the discussion so much of gall and bitterness which was not there before——

[Cries of "Oh! oh!" from the Ministerial benches.]

—I can only say that I hope, whenever the discussion on the question is brought forward, the Noble Lord will be prepared to tell us whom and what he means when he applies the terms "offensive and mendacious."

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH.—I may state, at once, that I mean to apply those terms to three fourths of the statements which have appeared in every paper opposed to the plan of the Government.

The question was then again put, "That the House be called over on Friday, the 14th day of June."

Mr. FRENCH.—Does the Noble Lord intend to press the call of the House, after the circumstances which have transpired?

LORD ASHLEY.—I do.

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

Strangers were then ordered to withdraw, but no division took place.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—I hope the Noble Lord will not now divide upon this question. It is my intention, in the course of a few days, to lay upon the table of the House certain papers relating to the subject of education, and explanatory of the vote which I mean to propose. When those documents shall have been produced, it will be for the Noble Lord to say whether he considers it necessary to renew his motion for the call of the House. If, however, the Noble Lord insists on going to a division now, I shall certainly consider myself bound to vote with him.

[Loud cries of "Divide, divide!"]

LORD ASHLEY.—Certainly nothing can be fairer than the proposition of the Noble Lord. I understand him to say that he will lay on the table of the House certain papers relating to the general subject, and explanatory of the vote he intends to propose, and that then the House will have an opportunity of forming a judgment. But with respect to the division now called for on my motion, the House must surely see that Honourable Gentlemen who generally act with me have left the House, on the understanding that no division would take place after the Noble Lord the Secretary of State had undertaken to second the motion.

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

If the House divide, Honourable Gentlemen opposite will gain what they may consider a victory; but it will not be a victory which will redound to their credit.

Mr. FRENCH.—Considering that the original proposition is to be withdrawn, I think it is too much for the Noble Lord (Ashley) to call upon this side of the House to support his motion, which, as far as my experience extends, has always been found to be practically useless.

SIR S. LUSHINGTON.—Nothing in the world would induce me to vote against the Noble Lord's motion. If I did so, I should conceive that I were guilty of practising a deception upon the House of Commons; because no one who heard my Noble Friend (Lord John Russell), the other night, could entertain a doubt that he assented to the proposition for the call of the House. The only question, then, is, whether, under the circumstances, the Noble Lord (Ashley) will deem it expedient to persevere in his motion.

Mr. SHEIL.—I think that the observation just made by the Right Honourable and Learned Member for the Tower Hamlets is quite conclusive of the question. There can be no doubt of the Noble Lord's right, if he think proper to press it, of insisting upon his motion for the call of the House; but I would respectfully submit to the Noble Lord, as an intimation has been given to him by the Noble Lord the Home Secretary, that the plan originally proposed is to be changed, whether he would not consult the convenience of Honourable Members by not insisting upon the call of the House? The whole matter rests entirely with the Noble Lord himself. If he insist on going to a division, I shall certainly consider myself bound to vote with him.

LORD ASHLEY.—I should be extremely sorry to do anything that was in the least degree annoying to the House, or that for a moment could be regarded as discourteous; but I have no means of knowing that the call of the House will not be as necessary as applied to the new plan, as it was to the old one. The Noble Lord (Lord J. Russell), however, has promised that the new plan shall be laid upon the table to-morrow. Under such circumstances, I can only say, that as soon as I have seen it, and have had the opportunity of consulting my friends with respect to it,—if it should appear not to require a strict attendance of Members when it comes to be discussed,—I will immediately move that the order for the call of the House be rescinded.

The motion was then again put, and agreed to.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT ACT.

GENERAL JOHNSON.—Sir, I move, according to my notice, that the following Returns be laid before this House:—

Returns "of all workhouses and buildings erected, or purchased, or hired, and converted into union workhouses, under the Poor Law Amendment Act, with the costs of erecting, purchasing, hiring, and converting the same into workhouses, and of the several principal sums borrowed for those purposes, and from whom, and at what rate of interest, and of all sums of money now due for principal and interest upon such principal sums respectively, and of the expenses attending the borrowing thereof:"

"Of the amount of all sums annually levied under the denomination of poor-rate; and, also, the amount of the sums paid for the actual relief and maintenance of the poor in each union, including and distinguishing in and out of door relief:"

"Of the amount of salaries, and the law expenses, and incidental charges in each union:"

"Of the salaries, expenses, and other charges for commissioners, with name of each assistant commissioner and officers belonging to the establishment at Somerset House, and the travelling expenses incurred by each of them; such and each of these Returns to commence from the passing of the Act, up to the 1st day of January last, distinguishing each year:"

"Of the number and names of the unions to which no order has been sent for withholding out of door relief to the able-bodied poor; stating the date of the formation, and the population of such unions, from the passing of the Act up to the 1st day of January last."

I think it right that these papers should be produced, in order that we may be enabled to contrast the expense incurred under the existing system with that which was incurred under the old poor law. I admit there is an apparent saving; but I am given to understand, that on investigation that saving will be found to be wholly fallacious, inasmuch as many of the expenses formerly charged upon the rate are now defrayed from another source,—besides which, the comforts of the poor have been greatly diminished. Many Honourable Gentlemen may be surprised when they are told that, in my own neighbourhood, where, during the last autumn, fevers raged to a very great extent, which occasioned a large consumption of wine in the union workhouse, the surgeon was asked, by the assistant commissioner, whether it was not possible to put some nauseous ingredient into the wine to make it unpalatable to the paupers, and thereby to diminish the consumption of that article, stating, at the same time, that the plan had been adopted in other unions with considerable success.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — I beg to second the motion.

The motion for the first Return was then put, and agreed to.

Upon the motion for the production of the second Return being put from the chair,—

Mr. F. MAULE said:—I do not object to the production of these Returns; but the second of them is of so intricate a nature that my Honourable and Gallant Friend must not be surprised if they are not made as quickly as he requires. I suppose that my Honourable and Gallant Friend would not object to my including in this second Return certain papers, calculated to explain the conduct of the Poor Law Commissioners respecting it.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — I think there can be no objection to my Honourable Friend adding any papers he pleases to these Returns; but I hope that he will not think of curtailing those now moved for. I think, also, that the House ought to be informed who the Poor Law Commissioner was who advised the workhouse-keeper to put some nauseous ingredient into the wine administered to the sick poor. I should like to know where that union workhouse is situate, and what is the name of the Poor Law Commissioner who has committed so atrocious an outrage upon humanity.

The motion was then agreed to.

On the third Return being put from the chair, —

Mr. F. MAULE said: — I am sorry that my Honourable and Gallant Friend should have given publicity to such a statement as he has just made, without stating the authority on which it rests. I am quite sure that no Poor Law Commissioner could have been guilty of such conduct as my Honourable and Gallant Friend has described.

GENERAL JOHNSON. — I believe the statement which I have just made to be true. I have no objection, if the House wish it, to name both the union and the Poor Law Commissioner.

[Cries of "Name, name!"]

The union is, the union of Bourne, in Lincolnshire. If her Majesty's Ministers choose to call the Poor Law Commissioner to the bar, and to hear evidence on the point, I will undertake to prove the case against him.

[Cries of "Hear!" and, "Name, name!"]

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — This, really, appears to be a case which ought to be investigated. I am convinced that it will turn out that the Honourable and Gallant Member has been misinformed.

[Renewed cries of "Name, name!"]

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — There is no further occasion to call for the name of the Poor Law Commissioner, as the commissioner is named by naming the union. It is impossible that a fact of such a description can remain unnoticed at a time when we are called upon to renew the Poor Law Amendment Act for another year. I know that it is almost high treason to say one word against that Act in this House; but when the proper time arrives, I will deliver my sentiments against it at length.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — I believe no Act has so completely succeeded within my recollection as the Poor Law Amendment Act.

Agreed to.

The other Returns were then severally put, and agreed to.

The following Returns, &c. were severally presented, and ordered to lie on the table; namely,— Education, — Copy of the Report of the Committee of Council (Address 4th of June). — To be printed.

Navy, — Return of the names of mates in her Majesty's navy on the 1st of January, 1839 (ordered 3d of May).

Jamaica, — Return of copies or extracts of communications transmitted to the Marquess of Normanby, on the 7th of May (Address 30th of May).

Answer to Addresses for papers (4th of June) reported.

JAMAICA.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — I wish to ask the Right Honourable Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether there would be any objection to the production of copies of the various Acts of Parliament relating to Jamaica? and if any of them have already been laid upon the table of the House? I wish to ask whether there would be any objection to their being immediately printed, so that they might be in the hands of Members before the discussion on the Jamaica Bill came on?

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — There can be no possible objection, unless any of them have already been included in the list of documents laid before the House. With respect to the copies of the other Acts, I will take care that all these Acts shall be produced with as little delay as possible.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — I wish to know if they will be printed?

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — They will be printed, if ordered to be printed by the House.

SIR R. INGLIS. — Sir, I should desire to ask the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite whether he would have any objection to Mr. Burge being heard upon his petition upon the second reading of the Jamaica Bill?

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — I have no reason to offer any objection to that course, and I hope that the address of the Learned Gentleman will attract a greater audience than it did on a former occasion, as I am extremely desirous that the House should hear everything that can be urged, by a gentleman so well acquainted as Mr. Burge is, with all the circumstances and condition of the colony.

PUBLIC EDUCATION.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — Sir, I regret that the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department is not in his place; but I wish to call the attention of the Government to the circumstance, that on the 30th of April last the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire moved an Address to the Crown for a copy of any Order in Council appointing a committee of council to superintend the application of any sums voted by Parliament for the purpose of promoting public education. That Address was presented on the 30th of April, and no Return has yet been made to the House.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — At present, I cannot account for the delay; but I will inquire into the circumstance.

BUENOS AYRES.

On the first Order of the Day being read, —

SIR S. CANNING said: — Sir, I think the present a fitting opportunity, seeing the Noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Department in his place, to put a question to him. The subject to which my question refers relates to the state of trade with the important port of Buenos Ayres. The House is aware that a blockade was instituted eighteen months ago by the French Government, and the consequence is that trade has been entirely suspended, of course to the serious interruption of the commercial interests of every nation trading with that part of the world, and the great detriment of our own. I believe that our loss would be found to have amounted to no less a sum than perhaps 2,000,000*l.* sterling, if the returns of the export trade could be produced. I think, therefore, that the anxiety of our merchants upon this subject should receive some relief, especially as, two days ago, intelligence was received that the blockade still continued. What I want to know is, whether, supposing the blockade still to be maintained, there is any prospect of its discontinuance? and whether her Majesty's Government has taken any steps, by mediation or otherwise, to shorten its duration? When I have received an answer to this, I shall ask another question; and the answer I receive to it will determine whether or not I shall feel it my duty to bring the whole matter before the House.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — Sir, the last despatches I have received from our minister at Buenos Ayres are dated the 21st of February, and at that time the blockade still continued. I can state that her Majesty's Government has been unremitting in the exercise of friendly offices, both at Paris and Buenos Ayres, in order to bring about an amicable adjustment of the matters in dispute.

SIR S. CANNING. — Sir, as the Noble Lord has not expressed an opinion that there is any prospect of immediate relief to our commercial interests, I should wish to be put in possession of the general grounds upon which the French Government found their right to enforce the blockade?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — The grounds have been published by the French Government, and by the Government of Buenos Ayres.

SIR S. CANNING. — I wish to ask the Noble Lord whether one of the grounds is not the demand of the French to be placed, by treaty, on the footing of the most favoured nations with regard to trade?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — Certainly, one of the demands is, that until a treaty of commerce be concluded, France shall be placed on the footing of the most favoured nations.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — I wish, Sir, to know whether anything has been done towards the settlement of the property of the late Mr. Lee, of Buenos Ayres? I am informed that it depends upon the raising of the blockade.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON. — I have received some information on the subject from our minister at Buenos Ayres; but I have not given it my own attention, as yet. The consul at Buenos Ayres has received instructions to give his utmost attention to the subject.

CLERKS OF THE PEACE BILL.

Considered in committee, and reported; further consideration of Report on Friday; Bill, as amended, to be printed.

COPYHOLDS ENFRANCHISEMENT BILL.

On the motion for going into committee on this Bill, —

SIR EDWARD SUGDEN said: — I hope that the Honourable and Learned Gentleman will postpone this Bill till next Session. I am friendly to a system of enfranchisement, and would be glad to co-operate with the Learned Gentleman opposite, in endeavouring to frame a measure giving greater facilities to powers of voluntary enfranchisement, and such other provisions as would meet the justice of the case; but I cannot consent to the compulsory powers, which would do great injustice to many parties, especially where a tenant for life might be obliged to pay for the enfranchisement of the reversion. I object, also, to the introduction of a system into this country which would call for the assistance of commissioners, to be paid at the public expense. I hope, however, that the Bill will be brought forward in the next Session of Parliament at such an early period as shall insure its being passed.

Mr. JAMES STEWART. — Sir, there are three modes by which enfranchisement of copyholds could be effected. There is the voluntary mode, by means of the tithe commission; there is the compulsory mode, by the same means; and there are facilities independent of both these modes. Even then, should the compulsory clauses be taken out, two other methods would still remain; and therefore I do not think the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman's objection forms any reason for postponing the Bill. The Bill was not brought forward on my own responsibility; but it was founded on the Report of a committee which sat last year, composed of Members of both sides of the House, and the resolutions were drawn up by the Right Honourable Member for Tamworth. The details of the Bill I have no objection to see altered. I hope, therefore, that the House will allow me to proceed with the Bill. I would be quite ready to abandon the compulsory clause, though I think it desirable, and to go on with the Bill, taking the two modes of voluntary enfranchisement contained in it. If the Bill has been brought in late in the Session, it is no fault of mine, as I attended night after night for the purpose of introducing it.

SIR G. STRICKLAND. — Sir, I understand, from the speech of my Honourable and Learned Friend, that he means to proceed with the Bill, but to give up the compulsory clauses. But, Sir, it appears to me that, even by giving up the compulsory clauses, its defects could not be remedied; and I shall therefore move that the committee be postponed to this day six months, and it will depend upon the support I receive whether I shall press this motion to a division. I did not oppose the second reading, because I understood from the Honourable Member for Honiton that he would reprint the Bill, and modify the compulsory clauses. The Bill has been reprinted, but the clauses remain as objectionable as ever. I think it should have been intituled, "A Bill to take away the Rights of all Lords of Copyhold Manors, and to compel the Tenants, whether willing or not, to purchase the same." The Bill is a direct interference with the rights of private property, in a manner in which the Legislature never dealt with it before. Hitherto we have never interfered with those rights, except when great public utility demanded such a course. I think that any general Bill, giving a compulsory power of enfranchisement applicable to all cases alike, would work great injustice. That was the opinion of Mr. Blamire, the chief tithe commissioner, to whom the working of this Bill was to be intrusted, and of many others. Sir, you have already heard that our plan is to give the tithe commissioner power to bring this Act into operation. I cannot conceive this possible, as I happen to know the principal commissioner, and I think he would hardly give such a recommendation.

SIR R. H. INGLIS. — I rise, Sir, to second the amendment; for, though I do not object, in toto, to the Bill, yet I entertain such objections to the compulsory clauses, that, unless the Honourable and Learned Gentleman will promise, in committee, to erase all those clauses, I must resist the progress of the Bill.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — I regret that any opposition is given to a Bill which, I am convinced, would confer great benefits on the country. I, myself, brought in a Bill for the enfranchisement of copyholds, founded on the Report of the Real Property Commissioners; but that Bill only provided for voluntary enfrnchisement. A committee was then appointed, formed of Members of both sides of the House, and in which the Right Honourable Member for Tamworth took an active part, to consider the whole question; and though, in the committee, I opposed the insertion of the compulsory clauses, yet, finding that they were strongly advocated by the Honourable Member for Tamworth, and other well-informed persons, I gave way, and cheerfully yielded up this Bill to the management of my Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Honiton. The committee called before them the tithe commissioners; and it was their opinion that its object could be effected, and effected beneficially; though, as the Honourable Member for the North Riding said, no general rule could be laid down. That was the very reason why it was proposed to appoint Mr. Blamire, and other discreet men, to carry out its provisions, and see that justice were done both to the lord and to the tenant. I hope that the House will not allow the Session to pass over without doing something to remove the reproaches cast upon the present law. I readily admit that the copyhold tenure has some advantages; but there is no advantage which could not easily be transferred to freeholds: and what are the disadvantages of the tenure? The interest of the lord in the soil is such as to work great public injustice. For instance, to all timber which is growing on copyholds the lord is entitled, and the result is, that none is planted; and this circumstance gave rise to the saying, "that the oak was too noble a plant to grow on a servile soil." Then, again, on a regrant, on death or alienation, the lord is generally entitled to a fine, equal to two years' improved value. So that no one will build upon copyhold land, or lay out any money to improve it. The Honourable Baronet says that this Bill would deal unjustifiably with private property; but when the public good requires it, we must deal with private property, — taking care, however, that all interested in the property should have ample compensation. In this Bill all the interests of the lord are carefully guarded, and it is equally beneficial to the lord and to the tenant. As, however, I find, that the Bill, as it stands, is to be strongly opposed,—and as, in the present state of the Session, any measure, so opposed, cannot be expected to pass,—I would advise my Honourable and Learned Friend to withdraw the compulsory clauses. The Bill, even then, would do much good. At present, when a tenant is on his death-bed, seven or eight different persons are waiting round him, in eager expectation for the preference, to seize upon his cattle. These are the remains of a barbarous age; and if we only get an alteration in this respect, from this Bill, it will do good. If the House will consent to go into committee, I am sure my Learned Friend will do all that can be reasonably desired; and I hope that we shall succeed in obtaining an instalment of progressive reform in copyhold law;—for this Bill, if it passes, cannot be held up as final, and you will never hear anything of the finality of the Copyhold Reform Bill,—and, whilst any abuses are to be remedied, I, for one, hope that reform will proceed. I think that the present Bill, even when altered, is calculated to do great good; and I trust that the owners of copyholds will gladly submit to regulations required for the public benefit,—following, in this, the example of the church on another occasion.

SIR EDWARD SUGDEN.—I have no objection to the alterations being made, provided that, when the Bill is altered, ample opportunity be afforded for the discussion of the measure, and for pointing out the objections that may exist against it.

LORD GRANVILLE SOMERSET.—Being exceedingly anxious that something should be done for the law of copyhold, I shall give my vote for the second reading of this Bill.

Mr. HOPE.—It will be my duty to call the attention of the House to a petition I presented, containing a statement of the grievance that would be inflicted upon the stewards of manors by this Bill; and I also wish to remind the House of a petition presented from the steward of the manor of Wakefield to the same effect.

Mr. ESTCOURT.—The interpretation clause is much more comprehensive than as it was arranged, when the Bill was in committee; and, in consequence, there is the most unjust interference with private property.

Mr. AGLIONBY.—If the House will not consent to go into committee except the compulsory clauses be struck out, I suppose the Honourable Mover must submit; but I protest against striking out that which is the most important part of the Bill. Still, however, much good will remain in the Bill, and, if forced, I must assent to the sacrifice; however, I will never lose an opportunity, so long as I have a seat in the House, of endeavouring to get rid of this odious remnant of the feudal system.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn; main question put, and agreed to; Bill considered in committee, and reported; further consideration of Report on Wednesday next; Bill, as amended, to be printed.

WINDSOR CASTLE STABLES.

House in committee.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.—I rise, Sir, to move, "That a sum, not exceeding 70,000*l.*, be applied, out of the land revenues of the Crown, to defray the expense of erecting stables and stable offices contiguous to Windsor Castle."

No man can have visited Windsor Castle without being aware that the stables belonging to it are very unsuited to a royal palace. It has been thought desirable to build new stables and a riding-school there, and I am happy in being able to state that this can be done without any charge on the public purse. If we were to take the amount required from the hereditary revenues of the Crown, it would be exactly the same as taking it from the public purse, as these revenues have been surrendered to the public. The amount, however, to which I have alluded has been saved, out of the fines of the land revenues, and therefore is not taken from the annual income. This fund has accumulated so as to enable us to build the stables out of it. At present, stables are rented in various parts of Windsor; and when the new buildings are erected these will be given up, and thus a saving will accrue. Again, it has been found necessary to build a riding-house at Windsor for the sake of the health of her Majesty. I will take this opportunity of correcting a delusion that has gone abroad, that the statements of the income from the land revenues which have appeared in the two or three last revenue papers, have arisen from the sale of portions of property. This, however, is not the case; but the sums in question have resulted from the revenues of the Woods and Forests. It has been asked, why has not a similar application of income taken place before? My answer is, that the land revenues of the Crown are incumbered with a debt, which amounts to upwards of 11,000,000*l.* for building Regent Street; and it is obvious that no surplus revenue could be applied until this debt was paid off. I trust, however, that there will be a continued increase in this branch of the revenue, as the property is an improving one."

Mr. M. PHILIPS.—Will the sum proposed to be voted cover the whole expense?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.—It will be sufficient.

Mr. WAKLEY.—As I deem 70,000*l.* for the building of stables an extravagant waste of the public money, I give notice that, at a future stage, I shall move that it be reduced to 50,000*l.* I would do so now, but that I fear that the House would be counted out.

The vote was then agreed to, and the resolution to be reported to-morrow.

BOROUGH COURTS BILL.

The MARQUESS of DOWNSHIRE presented petitions praying that provision may be made for the instruction of soldiers of the Presbyterian religion in the tenets of their peculiar faith, — of the minister, elders, and others of the Presbyterian congregation of Newry; and of the Presbyterian congregation of Anahilt. —Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

EDUCATION (NATIONAL).

EARL BEAUCHAMP presented petitions against the plan recommended by the Privy Council, — of the minister, churchwardens, and others of Rochford: and of inhabitants of Foulness; Kidderminster, Allcannings; and Greetham. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

MALTA.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.— I wish to observe, with reference to the motion of which the Noble Earl opposite has given notice, concerning the removal of certain individuals from office in Malta, that, on inquiry, I find that a correspondence has taken place on this subject, subsequent to that of which the House is already in possession, and which I wish to be laid before your Lordships. I trust that, in the unavoidable absence of my Noble Friend the late Secretary of State for the Colonies, the Noble Earl will consent to postpone his motion for the present; and also that he will allow me to add certain papers to those already produced, and thus to afford a greater degree of information to your Lordships.

The EARL of RIPON.—I do not think that the proposition to produce additional papers forms a ground of necessity for my putting off my motion for a third time; because I really do not consider that those papers are of any consequence. I received, last night, a communication from the late Noble Secretary (Lord Glenelg), saying he was labouring under severe indisposition, and that he should not be able to attend to-day; but adding, that he did not wish the motion to be postponed on account of his absence. But as my observations will certainly apply to some parts of that Noble Lord's conduct, and also to some portion of the conduct of the commissioners, — which observations that Noble Lord, alone, can be expected to be competent to reply to, —I do not feel that I can proceed with my motion to-night, without subjecting myself to some suspicion of unfairness. It is, however, extremely inconvenient, and extremely disagreeable to me, to have thus to postpone the matter, from time to time, because it not only affects the public, but it affects the interests and feelings of individuals; and if I put it off now, as I feel I must do, I venture to say the odds are that I shall never be able to bring it on at all.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — So far as I am concerned, I can assure the Noble Earl that I will afford him every facility for bringing on the discussion. I have nothing to do with the conduct of the commissioner; and if the Noble Earl wishes to proceed now, I shall not object to his taking that course.

The EARL of RIPON. — Under all the circumstances, it is impossible for me to proceed with the question now.

LORD PORTMAN. — The discussion ought to be brought on as soon as possible, in order that justice may be done to the parties concerned. The Attorney General for Malta feels that he is aggrieved, and he is most anxious that the question should be immediately considered. He has faithfully performed his duties, not only as Attorney General, but he has zealously discharged other duties which have been cast on him; and he deems it exceedingly hard that he should have been described as a sinecurist.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — No imputation whatever has been cast on the gentleman alluded to, for not duly and effectually performing all the duties which he had to discharge. The question is as to the extent and amount of those duties. But it is impossible for your Lordships to go into a discussion on one branch of the subject, without considering the whole question.

The EARL of RIPON. — I shall certainly take the earliest opportunity of bringing the matter forward.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT ACT.

EARL STANHOPE. — My Lords, I beg leave to present a petition from certain ratepayers of Milverton, in the county of Kent, praying for an amendment of the Poor Law Act. The petitioners are anxious that provision should be made to facilitate the granting of out-door relief in certain cases. As I see in his place a Noble Earl (the Earl of Hardwicke), who is chairman of the Caxton union, in the county of Cambridge, I shall take this opportunity of presenting two petitions to your Lordships, respecting certain proceedings which are alleged to have taken place in that union. I feel it right to say a few words on the rather unusual occurrence of presenting two petitions on the same day from the same individual, and on the same subject, to your Lordships. The petitioner calls for inquiry into her statement, which clearly can only be effected through a committee of this House. When a committee was sitting last Session to investigate certain complaints connected with the poor law, it was impossible for them to investigate all the cases in time, as Parliament was prorogued; and it is obvious that I could not present these petitions at an earlier period. They come from a woman of the name of Hannah Ingrey; and she, in the first petition, complains that she was compelled by the conduct of the Caxton board to dispose of her dwelling, that relief was refused her, and that she was turned into the street, where she was for some time exposed to the inclemency of the weather night and day. She also complains that her husband was unjustly condemned to imprisonment for three months in the county gaol of Cambridge. In the second petition, from the same party, she complains that she was sent backwards and forwards no less than fifty miles before she could procure relief, and that she was obliged to sell some of her clothes for the purpose of procuring food. She therefore earnestly prays for inquiry. Now, no man who is at all acquainted with the Noble Earl, can for a moment suspect that he would in any shape tolerate cruelty. The Noble Earl is, however, chairman of the board of guardians, and I feel that I have only done my duty in thus giving my Noble Friend an opportunity of explaining the matter.

The EARL of HARDWICKE. — I will endeavour, as briefly as possible, to answer the statement of the Noble Earl. I am sure your Lordships will always receive, with proper attention, petitions from the humbler classes of society; and when such petitions in any way concern one of your Lordships' body, that fact will, I believe, rather increase than diminish your desire to investigate the matters referred to in them. Your Lordships will recollect that, last year, a similar petition was sent up to this House from the husband of this petitioner. Now, I believe that some individuals are induced to make an unworthy attempt to excite prejudice against the poor law, rather than to point out real and tangible grievances under it. This petition alleges that certain oppressive acts have been perpetrated by me and the guardians of the Caxton union. Allegations are made in the present petition, either under a mistake on the part of the petitioner, or with a wilful intention with respect to the board of guardians, impugning their conduct very unjustly. So far as regards the board of guardians, no reference is made to any acts committed by them, which acts were not perfectly justifiable. It is made a matter of complaint, in the petition, that these parties were incarcerated. But what is the fact? They were in very great distress; and, fortunately for them, there was a workhouse ready to afford relief. Into that house they were received, and they became, of course, amenable to its rules. It is further alleged as a grievance, that the husband was sent to prison. The cause of his imprisonment was this: — He was permitted by the board of guardians to go out and seek for employment. He did so, and he was then called on to support his wife, which he was obliged to do by that Act of Parliament which provides that individuals shall be compelled to support their families if they are able to do so. The man refused. His offence came under the notice and jurisdiction of the magistrates, who visited it with imprisonment. The board of guardians had nothing whatever to do with the matter. The second petition complains that the petitioner was obliged to travel a certain number of miles for the purpose of receiving relief. Of that I know nothing. But I am certain that if the petitioner had made the board of guardians acquainted with the conduct of the relieving officer, and that person's conduct had appeared to have been improper, strict and prompt justice would have been done in the case. I am very sorry that this complaint was not sent to the Secretary of State; because in all cases of this nature, where complaint is so made, commissioners are sent down to inquire into the alleged grievance. They investigate the matter carefully, and they examine witnesses, judicially, on oath. Thus they get at the true facts of the case; and in every instance, I believe, strict justice is administered. I should be exceedingly glad if an investigation were to take place with respect to this or other complaints of a similar description. I think that the committee of last Session might be beneficially renewed, since its labours were useful in disabusing the public mind with respect to the operation of this measure. I need only further observe, that if, in this instance, any inquiry were instituted into the conduct of the board of guardians, I am convinced they would come fairly and honourably out of it.

Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

EDUCATION (NATIONAL).

LORD BROUGHAM.—My Lords, I hold in my hand a petition from inhabitants of St. Mary, Newington, Surrey, in vestry assembled, in favour of the national system of education, recommended by the Privy Council. The late Government scheme on this subject is, in my opinion, chiefly objectionable, because it does not go far enough.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE.—Among the many gross and extravagant falsehoods which are put in circulation respecting that scheme, has been the assertion that it is to be a system, and a compulsory system, of national education.

Read, and ordered to be received as the petition of John Inville (vestry clerk), who, only, has signed it.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT ACT.

EARL STANHOPE.—I beg to give notice of my intention, to-morrow, to present a petition relative to the new poor law, from the guardians of the parish of St. George, Southwark, complaining of wilful misstatements on the part of the dictators of Somerset House.

LORD BROUGHAM.—Who are they?

EARL STANHOPE.—The Poor Law Commissioners are correctly designated as the dictators of Somerset House; and if the Noble and Learned Lord does not know them by that name, I think he is almost the only man in Europe who does not. I shall also, to-morrow, present a petition from Thomas Coombs, of the Portsea Island union, disclosing a case of extraordinary hardship.

LORD BROUGHAM.—I do trust that my Noble Friend will not bring forward this matter to-morrow, as it would be highly inconvenient to the Noble and Learned Lord (Lord Lyndhurst), to put off his motion respecting the Courts of Chancery. The close of a debate is generally followed by another scene: we go to bed. The best course to adopt, as regards this petition, would be to have it printed.

EARL STANHOPE.—Then I beg to move that the petition of Thomas Coombs be printed.

LORD WHARNCLIFFE.—I beg to observe, that it is not your Lordships' habit, in this House, to print petitions.

EARL STANHOPE.—Very well. On Monday or Tuesday, if it be convenient to the House, I will present these petitions. In the mean time, I will read that which comes from Thomas Coombs.

To the Right Honourable the Lords spiritual and temporal in Parliament assembled.

The petition of Thomas Coombs,

Humbly showeth,—That your petitioner is a poor man with a wife and nine children, seven of whom are under sixteen years of age, and one only seven months old. His occupation is that of a labourer, chiefly digging clay for bricks, by which, working for Mr. Miall, one of the guardians of the Portsea Island union, he earned last summer 12*s.* a-week. But for fifteen weeks previous to the calamity which occasions his addressing your Right Honourable House he could not get any work whatever.

It is obvious that your petitioner could not, even when in constant work, support so large a family as his as it ought to be supported; and also that his wife could not, consistently with the discharge of her duties as a mother, earn anything in addition to that earned by him. His eldest child, a girl, stitches stays at seven farthings per pair, by which she cannot earn more than 1*s.* 9*d.* a-week. It may, perhaps, be asked why, if the remuneration be so low, the work is accepted? The answer is, the poor have no alternative but to accept whatever an employer may offer them, or starve. The Legislature has put the power of starving them into the hands of the administrators of the poor law, and they, as your petitioner is about to show, are ready to exercise it.

Having vainly attempted to keep himself and family by feeding on the very coarsest food, — namely, the refuse potatoes usually given to hogs, and sold for just half the price of those commonly eaten by man (in proof of which he may just state, that one day on his going to buy some the seller exclaimed to a bystander, "That man is going to fatten his children on my hog potatoes"), — he applied for relief to the guardians of Westbourne, of which union he is an acknowledged pauper, but was refused, — the board telling him that Portsea union was bound to keep him twenty-one days, and then send him home, when he would be placed in the workhouse. He therefore applied to the guardians of the Portsea Island union, stating to them the direction he had received from those of Westbourne; when he was refused by them also, and told, on asking how he was to get his children to Westbourne, that he might carry them on his back. Your petitioner believes that the refusal of his application by one, and probably by both of these boards, is contrary to law, or at least not enjoined by it; but, as the Legislature has refused to the poor an appeal from their oppressors, their right to relief when in distress, or claim for redress when wronged, is to all practical purposes a nullity.

Thus rejected and spurned as an outcast from society, your petitioner went about again seeking for work, till nature could endure no more. On the last day of January he dropped from the effects of want, and lay for some time — he knows not how long — on the snow. On coming to himself, after a little while, he staggered home, but immediately became so alarmingly ill that his life was despaired of.

Having thus reached that degree of suffering which the assistant commissioner for Hampshire gives as the description of destitution, namely, "being ready to drop in the street," and thus become qualified in the opinion of the Portsea board for relief, he had for his family 4*s.* and three gallons of bread weekly, and for himself medical relief, and such nourishment as the surgeon who attended him prescribed. And when he had recovered sufficiently to bear the journey, he was, with his family, removed to Westbourne workhouse, where they were first locked up in cold damp rooms, as if they had been guilty of some crime, and afterwards separated from each other with as little regard to their natural rights or feelings as if they had been so many cattle. Distressed as your petitioner and his wife and children had previously been, they had hitherto had the solace of each other's society, and the alleviation which mutual love, when it can but pity, can give. But now, though their bodily wants might perhaps have been less scantily supplied than they had been, those feelings with which God has alike endued the peer and the peasant were so outraged by this separation of the husband from the wife, and the parents from the children, that they could not endure it, and accordingly the next day left the house, preferring, if it must be so, to pine away from starvation rather than from a broken heart. What the issue may be your petitioner knows not. He obtained work from a contractor for a new church, but was obliged to give it up from weakness. Till his starvation he was a strong and healthy man; now he is enfeebled, perhaps for life; a victim to oppression which defrauds and destroys the poor to enrich the wealthy.

Your petitioner, with the humility which becomes a subject addressing the Legislature, but with the indignation which a loyal, honest, and industrious man may, though poor, be excused from feeling on the remembrance of wrongs so wantonly, though legally, inflicted, prays that protection may be co-extensive with allegiance, and therefore that such an alteration may be made in the poor law as may enable a poor man to obtain relief in necessity, or redress for the refusal of it. Had he died, the guardians would, he presumes, have been indictable (not that he supposes they would have been indicted) for manslaughter. He is led to this conclusion by supposing that the law assigns the duty of providing for the destitute to those whom it constitutes and designates their guardians; and hearing that a father, the legal guardian of his children, was lately indicted for "killing and slaying his son, by refusing to supply him with the necessaries of life." But the punishment of the manslayer, how salutary soever as an example to society, is no compensation to the victim for his death, or to his family for their loss. Your petitioner therefore further prays, that the redress he asks for may be attainable before matters have proceeded to the last extremity, and comprise a reparation to the injured as well as the punishment of the offender.

And your petitioner, as in duty bound, shall ever pray.

The mark + of THOMAS COOMBS.

Witness to the petitioner's signature,
EDMUND DEWDNEY,
Incumbent of St. John's Chapel, Portsea.

LORD BROUGHAM. — This poor man appears to have a very great gift of composition, and it is extraordinary such a person should not be able to obtain better employment than that of a day labourer at a few shillings per week.

EARL STANHOPE. — The poor man cannot write; he has only put his mark to the petition.

LORD BROUGHAM. — If it is signed by a marksman, then blame cannot be imputed to him for the gross misstatements which are made in the petition both with respect to law and to fact; but if another person wrote the petition, then he certainly is most reprehensible for making such atrocious misrepresentations. I shall be perfectly ready to demonstrate both the assertions I have made; namely, — that the petitioner misstates law, and misstates facts also.

EARL STANHOPE. — Has the Noble and Learned Lord ever heard of the case before?

LORD BROUGHAM. — No; but the statement, that the object of the poor law is to grind the faces of the poor for the benefit of the rich, is entirely new to me.

DEAN OF THE ARCHES.

The BISHOP of EXETER. — I beg to give notice that I shall, to-morrow, move that there be laid upon the table the commission or other instrument by virtue of which the dean of the Arches holds his office. I am happy to say I have the consent of the Most Reverend Prelate (the Archbishop of Canterbury) to this motion.

TITHE COMMUTATION.

LORD ASHBURTON. — I beg to ask whether it is the intention of Government to bring forward, shortly, any measure for the explanation or amendment of the Tithe Commutation Act? There are various parts of the Act which require one or other of these, and at this advanced period of the Session I think no further delay ought to take place.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — A measure of the sort is under the consideration of the Government; but, in the course of their communications with the commissioners on the subject, so many new points, for the most part of minor importance, have arisen, that the production of the measure has been inevitably delayed. This is the sole cause, as the Government are anxious that something should be done.

LORD PORTMAN. — I only wish that something may be done with regard to the mode of rating, not only tithe, but other property. In consequence of a late judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, there is no one rate in the kingdom which could be maintained, if it were to be contested. That judgment had the effect of reviving a principle which has never been acted upon since the time of Elizabeth. It affects not only the poor-rate, but the way-rate, which is founded on the poor-rate. The judgment, in fact, imposes an income tax. Something should be done; and I think a separate legislative measure will be necessary.

LORD WROTTESLEY. — The practice of taxing goods to the poor rate is unsatisfactory, and always has been unsatisfactory. The best mode of settling these cases is by private compromise.

LORD ASHBURTON. — I agree that the judgment spoken of by the Noble Lord goes to effect a complete revolution in the mode of rating. By the law, as it now stands, the profits of the farmer are liable to be rated.

SPAIN.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — I beg to give notice that I shall, to-morrow, inquire of the Noble Viscount opposite whether any effectual measures are to be taken by the Spanish commission, now sitting, for the liquidation of the claims of the unfortunate officers of the British Legion?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I believe considerable progress has been made towards the liquidation of the claims; but I will inform myself more fully respecting the case by to-morrow.

ISLAND OF NEWFOUNDLAND.

The EARL of ABERDEEN presented petitions for the abolition of the present Colonial Legislature, and for the adoption of a better system of government, — of merchants, traders, and shipowners of Conception Bay; and of merchants of Torquay. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

SHERIFFS (IRELAND).

VISCOUNT LORTON. — I beg leave to present a petition from the county of Sligo, signed by 500 residents, including a very influential body of landed proprietors, complaining of the conduct of Mr. D. Jones, sheriff of the county, a Roman Catholic gentleman, appointed in 1837. The petitioners state that certain political societies have been formed in the county with the object of procuring, by various unconstitutional means, the registration of a poor class of voters, who do not really possess the qualification required by law, and that that proceeding has had the effect of severing the tie which before bound together the landlords and tenantry of the country. In 1837, this sheriff took on himself the appointment of juries to try the claims of voters rejected by the assistant barrister, and chose, exclusively, for jurors — persons belonging to those societies, with the view, as alleged by the petitioners, of securing the return of his son, Mr. D. Jones, for the county. The petition goes on to state various acts of improper interference on the part of the sheriff with the course of the registration. In conclusion, I beg to move that it be referred to the Committee on the State of Ireland in respect of Crime.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — There is only this, to be said, as regards the motion of the Noble Viscount who has just sat down, — that my Noble Friend must expect the parties of whom complaint is made to be heard in their defence.

VISCOUNT LORTON. — Certainly.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I look upon the charges brought forward by the petitioners with the greatest possible distrust. However, if the Noble Viscount persist in his motion, I have no objection to it. The committee ought not to shrink from any labour imposed on them.

Agreed to.

PRISONERS (IRELAND).

On the motion of LORD WHARNCLIFFE, ordered to be laid before the House —

"Copies of all medical certificates received by the Lord Lieutenant or Chief Secretary of Ireland with respect to the inability, from ill health, old age, or infirmity, to travel, of prisoners under sentence of transportation from Ireland, in the years 1835, 1836, 1837, and 1838:" And, also,

"Return of the names of all convicts under sentence or rule of transportation who have been discharged from the hulks or transports in any of the ports of Ireland since the 1st of May, 1835; distinguishing the offences of which they have been respectively convicted, the place of trial, the sentences pronounced or recorded upon them, and whether any and what commutation or remission of the original sentence, or any part thereof, had previously been granted; stating, also, the date of the discharge and the nature of the authority under which such convicts were respectively discharged, with the date or time thereof."

RULES OF PROCEEDINGS (BOROUGH COURTS BILL).

Returned from the Commons, agreed to, with amendments; and Bill to be printed, with the amendments.

BEER ACT IN PART REPEAL BILL.

Reported from the Select Committee, with amendments: to be printed, as amended; and committed to a committee of the whole House to-morrow; and the Lords summoned.

MAYNOOTH COLLEGE.

of Westfield; Brede; and Hollington. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

FOREIGN FRUIT.

Petition against the importation of, unless upon payment of a duty sufficient for the protection of the home grower, — of owners and occupiers of orchards and fruit plantations, and others interested in the growth and sale of British fruit in the parish of Little Eversden. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

BEER ACT.

Petition for alteration of, — of magistrates, clergy, bankers, merchants, and others of Liverpool. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

PAPERS.

Resolutions of the Court of Directors of the East India Company, being the warrants or instruments granting any pension, salary, or gratuity. — Delivered (pursuant to Acts), and ordered to lie on the table.

Lists specifying the particulars of compensation proposed to be granted to certain persons late in the service of the East India Company, under an arrangement sanctioned by the Board of Commissioners for the Affairs of India. — Delivered, and ordered to lie on the table.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

White Lead Company Bill; Filtration Company Bill. — Read a third time; amendments made; Bills passed.

West Croft (Nottingham) Inclosure Bill; Norwich Tonnage Bill; Nottingham Common Fields Inclosure Bill. — Read a third time, and passed.

Almsworthy (Somerset) Inclosure Bill. — Reported; to be ingrossed.

Commercial (London and Blackwall) Railway Bill. — Reported; Report to lie on the table, and to be printed.

Glossop Small Debts Bill. — Committee on Bill revived.

Turnpike Trusts Committee. — Report brought up, and read; to lie on the table, and to be printed.

The following petitions were severally presented; namely, —

Birmingham Canal Bill, — Of William C. Hunt, praying that the committee to whom the petition for provision in the Bill has been referred, may have leave to sit on Monday next, or that the consideration of the Report on the Bill be postponed until the petitioners shall have been heard. — To lie on the table, and to be printed.

Rathkeale (Limerick) Inclosure Bill, — Of Robert Maunsell, solicitor for the Bill, stating that subsequent to the notices having been given of the application to Parliament for the Bill, the petitioner learnt that the surveyor appointed under the Act 6 Geo. IV., for ascertaining the boundaries of parishes, &c. in Ireland, had struck the bounds of the parishes of Rathkeale and Croagh through the centre of the commons proposed to be inclosed, so that the same are now in the parishes of Rathkeale and Croagh, and not solely in the parish of Rathkeale, and praying that such alterations or provisions may be allowed to be made in the Bill to meet the circumstances of the case.

Celfast Water (No. 2.), — Of Belfast Charitable Society, against the application for a Bill.

Referred to the Select Committee on Petitions for Private Bills.

Rochdale Small Debts (No. 2.) Bill, — Of James Dearden, Esquire, against.

Brompton New Road Bill. — Petition of trustees of the Alliance British and Foreign Fire and Life Assurance Company, and Alliance Marine Assurance Company, against.

Referred to the committees on the Bills; counsel ordered.

Kingston upon Hull Dock. — Petition of Charles Frost, for dispensing with the Standing Orders (presented 5th of June). — Read.

Ordered, That under the circumstances of the case stated in the said petition, the Standing Order, requiring ten clear days between the day on which the petition for any Private Bill shall be presented and the day on which the subcommittee shall sit thereupon, be dispensed with in the case of the Kingston upon Hull Dock petition; and that the subcommittee to whom the said petition is referred do sit and proceed thereupon on Tuesday next.

LONDON BRIDGE APPROACHES BILL.

(Queen's consent signified): — Motion made by Mr. HERRIES, and question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

SIR R. INGLIS. — It is with reluctance I rise to oppose a Bill of which my Right Honourable Friend has the care, and into whose hands I should rather see it put than into the hands of the worthy Alderman opposite. But my objection remains unaltered, not merely to the Bill, but to the circumstances under which it is introduced to the House. My objection to it is, that it contains provisions that have no relation to the title of the

Bill, and which go to authorise the demolition of St. Bartholomew's Church, near the Royal Exchange, — a church that is numerously attended, in which divine service is performed four times a week, and which was attended by 700 persons on Tuesday last. By the 71st clause of the Bill, power is given to the Governor and Company of the Bank of England to destroy that church. I may be told that it is essential to do so for the completion of a thoroughfare; but I believe that that is not the fact, and that it has been shown before the committee that the removal of a particular part only of the church will suffice for that purpose. I am ready, though unwillingly, to consent that that part of the church — namely, the tower — shall be pulled down; but I am not ready to consent to give a power to the Governor and Company of the Bank of England to traffic with consecrated ground, as I conceive this to be. The removal of the tower will give a space of forty feet, which is wider than many of the thoroughfares of the city. I have been told that the Bill, as it stands, has the consent of the Archbishop of Canterbury and of the Bishop of London. No one can feel more strongly than I do the value and importance of such sanction; but though I may have the greatest confidence in those Reverend Prelates with regard to this measure, I cannot have the same confidence in the Bishops of forty years hence. Besides, a great number of persons will be deprived of their place of worship if this measure be passed.

Another objection to the total destruction of the church is, the sacred circumstance of Miles Coverdale, the first translator of the Bible, being interred in it. I have been told that, in the course of the improvements made within the last ten years, three churches were destroyed; and that, during the last century, twenty churches were so destroyed. But that, instead of being an argument in favour of this Bill, is surely a strong reason why the House ought not to consent to the destruction of more churches. The only object of the Bill is, to improve the access to the Bank of England and the Royal Exchange; which can be effected, as I have already said, without touching the main body of the church. I do not mean to oppose the third reading of the Bill, but to propose that the words "part of" be inserted in the Bill, before the words authorising the church to be pulled down; and, if that be not objected to, I shall move the omission of certain corresponding clauses.

Mr. HERRIES. — I am not surprised at the opposition of the Honourable Baronet, — knowing, as I do, the interest which he takes in every measure connected with the established church. But I can assure the Honourable Baronet that the committee on the present Bill have sanctioned it, in its present shape, with the best feelings towards the church, — and after having investigated every circumstance connected with the case most carefully and minutely. I can also assure my Honourable Friend, that I at first took the same view of the question, in committee, as he does now. My Honourable Friend, however, has overrated the importance of the church in question as a place of worship. I doubt not that 700 persons attended divine worship there on Tuesday last, being a particular occasion; but usually the number is extremely limited, — not being above 50 or 60, if even so much. The leading consideration that determined the committee to leave the Bill as it stands was, that it gives an alternative power to pull down the church or only part of it, as circumstances may require. The Archbishop of Canterbury and the Bishop of London are appointed trustees; and the church cannot be removed unless these Reverend Prelates shall deem such a step unavoidable.

Mr. PATTISON. — The removal of the church will take place at the expense of the Bank of England, and the sum of 5000*l.* has been already subscribed for the purpose of building another church in an adjoining and more populous neighbourhood.

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON. — However obvious, and unquestionably advisable, may be the contemplated improvements, I very much fear that the demolition of a church of such long standing, and which carries with it so many objects of interest, will establish a precedent of a most dangerous character. The Honourable Member opposite says that a sum of money has been subscribed to build another church; but is that church to be in the same parish?

Mr. PATTISON. — It is not wanted there.

LORD DUNGANNON. — That may sound very well; but the precedent is no less dangerous on that account, even if it be the fact. A considerable concession is made by allowing the removal of the tower; but it certainly is too much to ask for the total destruction of the church, more particularly when it is proved that such is not necessary for the object of the Bill.

Mr. SHEPPARD. — I must say that the pulling down of a church for such a purpose as that contemplated by this Bill is contrary to the best interests of the country.

Mr. ESTCOURT. — I quite agree with the Honourable Member. It is a monstrous thing to call upon us to sanction the destruction of a church at a time that we are contributing largely for the erection of churches throughout the metropolis. It is said that 5000*l.* have been subscribed to replace it by a new church; but that is to be erected in a different parish, and will, therefore, be of little or no avail to those who frequent the existing one. Parliament, the public, and the Bishop of London, have declared that there is an alarming want of church accommodation in the metropolis, yet power is sought by this Bill to destroy one of the metropolitan churches, — and upon grounds which, in my mind, are quite insufficient.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — As a member of the committee, and as a friend to the church, I beg to say that I, at first, felt some difficulty upon the subject; but as the intended improvements relate to other objects than that of mere width, — as the removal of the church must necessarily take place under the authority of the Archbishop of Canterbury and the bishop of the diocese, — and as another church will be built at no great distance from the site of the present one, affording, as it will, the additional advantage of increased accommodation, — I confess I cannot see any harm in the removal of the present church, under the sanction of these Reverend Prelates.

SIR R. INGLIS. — After the explanations which have been given by my Right Honourable Friend who moved the third reading of the Bill, and the Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down, I will not press my suggestion any further, — although I certainly am not, by any means, reconciled to the measure.

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON. — I am exceedingly sorry to trouble the House by calling for a division on this Bill, particularly after the withdrawal, by the Honourable Baronet, of the reasonable proposal which he made; but, considering the precedent which will be established, if the Bill is passed, to be of so serious a character, I should deem myself neglectful of my duty if I did not press for the sense of the House. I therefore move, as an amendment, "That the Bill be read a third time this day three months."

The House divided: — Ayes 82; Noes 33; — Majority 39.

Committee deferred till to-morrow.

LORD CHANCELLOR (IRELAND).

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I give notice, Sir, that on Tuesday, the 11th of June, I shall move for leave to bring in a Bill to enable Roman Catholics to hold the office of Lord Chancellor, and certain offices in the ecclesiastical courts, in Ireland.

CORRESPONDENCE UPON MINISTERIAL ARRANGEMENTS.

Mr. WAKLEY. — I am anxious to know from the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department, and from the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, whether either of them will offer any opposition to a motion for an Address to the Crown, praying that her Majesty will be graciously pleased to direct that a copy of the correspondence which passed between her Majesty and the Right Honourable Baronet, Sir Robert Peel, relative to the arrangements which were made, or which were to have been made, for the formation of a new Administration, be laid on the table of this House?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I shall certainly oppose any such motion.

Mr. WAKLEY. — Then, Sir, I give notice that on Tuesday, the 11th of June, I shall move that an humble Address be presented to her Majesty, for a copy of the correspondence which passed between her Majesty and the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, relative to certain Ministerial arrangements; and which correspondence was, with her Majesty's permission, read to the House by the Right Honourable Member for Tamworth, on the 14th day of May last.

ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS BILL.

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON. — I beg to know at what period of the Session the Noble Lord expects to have it in his power to proceed with the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — It is appointed for the 17th instant; but as there are many other important measures before the House, which will necessarily claim a priority of consideration, I doubt whether it will be in my power to bring forward the Ecclesiastical Courts Bill on that day.

CANADA.

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON. — The Noble Lord has appointed Thursday next for the further consideration of the resolutions relating to Canada. I understood that he had previously fixed the Copyright Bill for that day, and had given an assurance that it should be taken the first thing.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I certainly appointed the Copyright Bill for that day. At the same time, I think the House will feel that the question of the Canadas is one of much greater importance, and ought to have priority. I may take this opportunity of stating, that it is my intention, if both the resolutions I have proposed with respect to Canada shall be agreed to, to bring in a Bill founded upon each of them. There will thus be two measures. With regard to that which will be founded upon the first resolution, and which relates to the union of the two provinces,—I shall not propose to carry it further, this Session, than the second reading; but the Bill founded upon the second resolution, I certainly hope to pass into a law with as little delay as possible.

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON. — I hope the Noble Lord will make some such arrangement with the Honourable and Learned Member for Reading (Mr. Serjeant Talfourd) as will admit of the Copyright Bill being brought forward on an early day.

ROMAN CATHOLIC BISHOPS.

SIR R. INGLIS. — I wish to put a question to the Noble Lord upon a subject which I consider of some importance. The House is aware that a requisition to convene a meeting to address her Majesty was recently presented to the high sheriff of the county of Mayo, the first name to which is that of the lord lieutenant of the county. The next, as reported in the Freeman's Journal, is a "John, Archbishop of Tuam." I will take no notice of the third signature, and will give no opinion upon it; but I wish to ask whether the Noble Lord has instructed the Attorney General for Ireland to take any proceedings — in consequence of the assumption, by this person, of that title — in reference to the clause in the Roman Catholic Relief Bill, which prohibits Roman Catholic prelates from assuming the titles of Protestant dignitaries?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I have not seen the requisition to which the Honourable Baronet has alluded; nor have the Government given any directions to the Attorney General, or communicated with the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland on the subject; and, unless there be an absolute necessity for so doing, it is not my intention to take any steps in reference to it. On one occasion, when an application was made to me on behalf of Dr. M'Hale, who was described under the title of Archbishop of Tuam, asking that a certain petition should be laid before his late Majesty, I immediately replied, that I could not present the petition to his Majesty, as it represented the individual in question under a name to which by law he was not entitled. If the subject should ever come before me, officially, I shall entirely deny that Dr. M'Hale has any right to assume that title; but I cannot agree in the propriety or expediency of instituting prosecutions on such a subject.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I do not know whether the Noble Lord is aware that there is no such clause in the Roman Catholic Relief Act as that stated by the Honourable Baronet. The clause prohibits others from giving to Roman Catholic bishops and archbishops the titles borne by Protestant prelates; but it does not prevent Roman Catholic prelates from taking them, themselves.

[Laughter.]

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — In the case to which I have alluded, the title was given by another, and not assumed by Dr. M'Hale; and on that ground I declined to present the petition.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — There is no such Protestant dignitary as the "Archbishop of Tuam," at the present time. There is a Bishop of Tuam, but no archbishop.

SIR R. INGLIS. — After the confident manner in which the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin had declared the law on this question, I was unwilling to put my opinion against that of the Honourable and Learned Member, who, I understand, is learned in the law on these matters, until I should have consulted the Act itself. That Act I have now in my hand, and here it appears that I was right, and that the Honourable and Learned Member was wrong. The clause of the Act to which I alluded is in these words: — "Be it therefore enacted, that if any person, after the commencement of this Act, other than the person thereunto authorised by law, shall assume or use the name, style, or title of archbishop of any province, bishop of any bishoprick, or dean of any deanery, in England or Ireland, he shall for every such offence forfeit and pay the sum of 100*l.*"

[Cheers.]

Now, it is clear that this reverend person was not "thereunto authorised by law," in the assumption of the style and title of "Archbishop of Tuam."

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I admit that I was wrong, and that the Honourable Baronet was right.

[Cries of "Oh, oh, oh!"]

The law is the reverse of what I conceived it to be; it is, that the Catholic clergyman must not assume the title or style of a Protestant bishop, though the law does not prevent any person from giving it to him and addressing him by such title.

[Laughter.]

But there is now no such Protestant title as Archbishop of Tuam.

ELECTION PETITIONS TRIAL BILL.

On the Order of the Day for going into committee on this Bill being read, —

SIR E. SUGDEN said: — Sir, as this is a subject of great importance, and one on which I have not had, before the present time, an opportunity to express my opinion, I beg leave to offer a few words to the attention of the House. In my opinion, the Bill reflects great credit on the ability and industry of my Right Honourable Friend, and will materially raise the proceedings of this House in the estimation of the country. In the first place, I entirely agree with the principle recognised in the Bill, — namely, that this House shall not relinquish its jurisdiction in matters of this kind. The House will perceive that this is a most important point. We have shown ourselves perfectly willing to place ourselves under such restrictions as may satisfy the country that we are anxious for a just tribunal. Now, the great question is, How are we to furnish such a tribunal? I think the plan of my Right Honourable Friend — that of having a select committee — is an excellent plan. I believe that a great number of the evils under the old Act arose from the excitement attending petition ballots. Another evil consisted in the circumstance of a Member, conscientiously determined on doing justice, being occasionally obliged to vote against the wishes of his party. This obligation caused a great deal of unpleasant feeling. I think my Right Honourable Friend's plan is as well calculated to obviate those evils as any that could be suggested; because, under it, all excitement will be avoided. Sir, as regards the working of the plan, I think there is no doubt it will work efficiently, — that the Members chosen will do their duty; — but, on the other hand, I am afraid that duty will be found disagreeable. For example: the active Members on each side will soon become known, and lists will be drawn by each party. There is another difficulty; which is, that the general committee cannot select the special committee without knowing all the circumstances connected with every Member of this House: this will lead, perhaps, to invidious inquiries. There will be a difficulty, too, in choosing the seventh Member, as that post will always be a matter for competition. Now, the principal object I have in making these observations is, to consider whether or not we could, beneficially, go beyond the plan of my Right Honourable Friend. I have already stated that I am strongly opposed to any relinquishment of our jurisdiction; but I am afraid that, to make it effective, we must go beyond the present Bill. We all know that there are questions of law constantly arising, in which gentlemen are so embarrassed by the legal arguments on both sides, that they are incapable of coming to any sound conclusion on them; but, being aware of the bias of their party, they give the benefit of their doubts that way. There was one instance of this in the select committee by which Mr. Wilberforce was unseated for want of qualification. Several members of that committee asked my opinion as to the qualification, but I declined giving it while the investigation lasted; though, when the question was decided, I looked into the titles, — and my decided opinion is, that a better qualification could not exist. In saying this, I make no impeachment against the fairness of that committee; I merely mention the fact, to show the consequences arising from deficient legal knowledge in those committees. One Gentleman confessed, in the former debate, that so much was he perplexed in a certain petition case, that he actually made out an A. B. case, and submitted it to counsel. Now, I would ask the House, could anything be more dangerous than this course? If such a precedent were once established, a Member not inclined to act fairly could go on applying to lawyers until he got a favourable opinion, and then might attempt to influence the decision of the committee by means of that opinion. As to the suggestion of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman opposite, — that the question should be sent to a judge and jury, — I fear that public opinion is so strongly against mixing up the judges with political questions, that that plan would decidedly fail. On the whole, I think the present plan will be attended with great good, and I shall therefore vote for its going at once into committee.

The House then resolved itself into a committee.

Clauses 1. to 21. agreed to.

Clause 22. Referring to the appointment, by the Speaker, of the general committee to select the sub-committee to try election petitions.

On this clause being proposed, —

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON said: — Sir, we have now come to the clause which gives to the Speaker power to appoint a general Committee of Selection; and I entertain considerable doubt as to the practical working of this clause. The committee to try petitions is to consist of seven members, to be chosen by the general committee to be nominated by the Speaker. Now, this committee will have a very great difficulty in selecting the second committee. I do not understand in what manner the seventh member of the sub-committee can possibly be selected so as to constitute it an impartial tribunal. It is notorious that there are but few Members in this House who are not attached to one or the other of the two great political parties into which the House is divided. It is also known that a strong opinion exists on the part of the Members of these two great political sections on the subject of opening the Irish registry. One party is in favour of opening the registry, while the other is opposed to it. Now, if that question were to arise in the committee, I do not know in what way the seventh member could be so chosen as to secure an impartial decision upon it. The opinions of the few Members who may be regarded as unconnected with either of the two great parties on the question of opening the registry will soon become known; therefore the hope of selecting one of that class to constitute the seventh member, with a view to form an impartial tribunal, cannot long be entertained. I ask, again, how is this point to be met? When I asked the question out of the House, I was told it would be necessary to effect a change in the Irish law of registration. To be sure, nothing could be more desirable than that! But there is little sign of any such change; and we must deal with facts as we meet them. This has always appeared to me to be a great practical objection on the face of the Bill. The principle of selection involves the certainty that the seventh member must give a predominance to one political party or the other. You may say, "Give the seventh member one time to one party, and the next to another; and that then, on the whole, justice would be administered." But this kind of justice would not satisfy the parties concerned. Therefore, while I consider the twenty-one preceding clauses to have been most ingeniously and correctly devised, I have ventured, before the question is put, to suggest the doubts I entertain as to the practical working of this clause.

SIR R. PEEL. — Sir, I will endeavour to give a satisfactory answer to the objection of my Noble Friend. In the first place, I take it for granted that the jurisdiction is to remain in the House of Commons. If my Noble Friend urged his argument for the purpose of showing that that jurisdiction ought to be transferred to another tribunal, that would be an entirely different question; but I have a right to assume that the intention of the House is, that the jurisdiction shall remain with them. Then, the objection of my Noble Friend proceeded upon the assumption that the House is divided into two great parties, one decidedly in favour of opening the registry, and the other as decidedly opposed to it. Now, I deny that assumption. I, for one, have never given an opinion upon that subject; and I believe there are a great many other Members who have not done so. I do not believe that, however forcible the arguments which may be addressed to the House on one side or the other of that question, Members are so determined to maintain their own opinions as not to allow adverse arguments to have any weight in coming to a decision. I do not believe that Honourable Members are so wedded to their political opinions as to afford no chance of justice being done to the parties whose case might rest on those arguments. And yet this is necessary to be assumed,— in order to support my Noble Friend's arguments. My Noble Friend would leave the appointment of the special committee of seven Members to chance. How would he better the case by that? There would still be an odd Member! Now, according to the hypothesis of my Noble Friend, every Member would vote according to his party bias, and not according to argument. But is not that the case at present? On one occasion, the committee is in favour of opening the registry, and on another, it is against it; so that, although, in the general result, a sort of "wild justice" is done, yet no justice is done in any individual case. But if it should happen that there are a number of Members not committed upon this particular question of opening the registry, — and I believe there are more than fifty who are perfectly willing to attend to the arguments that may be urged on the subject, and who would not decide upon mere party motives; — then, what I contend for is, that the selection would afford a greater probability of justice being done, than the leaving the appointment of the seven Members to chance. If so, and if the jurisdiction is to remain in the House, though the remedy I propose may be imperfect, still it is better than the present state of the law. But it is the duty of Parliament to settle the question of opening or not opening the registry.

[Cries of "Hear, hear, hear!"]

My Noble Friend took one single point, on which he urged an objection, namely, the manner in which parties, in this House, are divided; and then charged that defect, not on the party which ought properly to bear it, but on the tribunal itself. Why can we not so far disarm ourselves of party feeling, as to address ourselves to the question, and determine whether the Irish registration should be opened, or not? In the first place, then, I deny my Noble Friend's assumption that the parties are completely divided upon that question. I deny it for myself, and for a hundred other Members, — all of whom, I am confident, would decide by argument, and not by party feeling. My second answer to my Noble Friend's argument is, granting his hypothesis to be correct, "that parties are equally divided upon the question," that selection is better than chance; and in the third place, I would say, that it is the duty of Parliament to settle the question; and if it neglect that duty, that is no reason why the House should not make the best provision possible to meet the difficulty.

Mr. VERNON SMITH. — Sir, I perfectly agree with the opinion expressed by my Noble Friend. The Right Honourable Baronet would contend that the example mentioned by my Noble Friend is the only case in which party feeling could interfere. But there are many others I could mention: there is, for instance, the case of trustees of dissenting chapels, which is fast becoming a party question. I do not think the Right Honourable Baronet has met the difficulty suggested by the Noble Lord; nor made out a case to justify the House in adopting the measure. The Right Honourable Baronet contends that selection is better than chance. If the selection of the seven Members who are to form the particular committee were impartially made, it might be a better mode than to leave their appointment to chance; but I could point out to the House cases where selection would be much worse than chance. The Right Honourable Baronet has not shown us how the selection is to be settled when he comes to appoint the seventh Member. Can he say that, while there should be three Members of one set of opinions, and three of another, yet the seventh would be a Member who would act with perfect impartiality as an arbitrator? If not, then the Right Honourable Baronet cannot maintain that the principle of selection is better than that of chance. This Bill has not been brought forward in accordance with the views of any previous committee of inquiry. On the contrary, it is actually in the face of the committee which was conducted by the Honourable and Learned Member for Liskeard (Mr. C. Buller). The House has nothing but the Right Honourable Gentleman's own showing to justify our adoption of the measure. I have no objection to the selection of the general committee of six Members by the Speaker; but then his appointment ought to be imperative upon the Members, and not optional. But the Right Honourable Gentleman, by this 22d clause, requires two things; — namely, the willingness of the Members to serve, and that the list of the Members nominated should be open to the disapproval of the House during the next three days. Why should not the appointment be imperative?

Mr. O'CONNELL. — Sir, the objection of the Noble Lord certainly does apply to the principle, although he illustrates his meaning by comparing the details. The Noble Lord's objection, on the ground of party feeling biassing the decisions of election committees, is borne out in many instances. Political feeling has created a difference of decision upon the question of opening the registry; also, as to the value of the franchise. The assistant barristers selected in Tory times are of opinion that 10*l.* clear value means 10*l.* paid by a solvent tenant; whereas the assistant barristers, appointed latterly, hold a different opinion. Thus a question, strictly one of law, is regulated by the party bias of the individual! And even judges have not escaped the imputation; for there are some who hold one opinion, and some another, on this question of value. The Right Honourable Baronet has asked, why should not the Legislature decide whether the registry should be opened, or not? Is there the least chance of our obtaining such a decision? Everybody knows that if any Bill were to go to the House of Lords upon the subject, they would introduce a clause for opening the registry, while the Commons would be for closing it. We must, then, take the law as we find it. The Right Honourable Baronet has said that selection is better than chance. It is, however, contrary to the practice with regard to other tribunals. In trials by jury the tribunal is appointed by chance. Selection was the original mode; but that has been abandoned, and chance adopted in its place. The great mischief in this House arises from men deciding, upon oath, questions upon which they are influenced by party feeling. It is a great evil that persons of the rank and station in life of those who compose this House should be led to decide in that manner. To reserve the decision of election questions exclusively to this House, may, perhaps, be justified on general and constitutional principles; but it has manifestly a most unhappy result. There is this to be said for appointments by chance instead of selection: a person who is defeated by chance is certainly not so much irritated as if he were defeated by selection. I do not, therefore, think there will be any improvement in resorting to selection instead of chance. I have another objection to urge, on which, although I do not intend to offer any vexatious opposition to the Bill, I shall certainly take the sense of the House. I think the mode proposed to select the particular committee for trying election cases would do away with all responsibility. I would prefer — if seven Members are to be selected at all for the trial of petitions — that the Speaker should have the responsibility of appointing them. It is a mere nominal responsibility to appoint the six Members who are to constitute the general committee, because those six persons will have to try nothing. If they, who form that general committee, do not act egregiously wrong in the selection of the particular committee of seven, public opinion will not affect them; nor, as the case stands, will public opinion affect the Speaker, because the general committee of six must stand between him and the particular committee of seven. Responsibility is, in fact, annihilated by multiplying the number of those who are to share it. Upon this ground, also, as well as because I concur in the able argument of the Noble Lord (Lord Mahon) upon the other point, — namely, party bias, — I shall take the sense of the House upon this clause.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — Sir, I certainly concur in the argument urged by the Noble Lord and the Honourable and Learned Member, against the principle of giving to the general committee the power of selecting the particular committees; and I think the answer of the Right Honourable Baronet to that argument a most insufficient one. At the same time, I cannot concur in the objection to the clause now before the committee, which has no reference to the power of selection; that being given by a subsequent clause. I think the present clause, in so far as it refers to the appointment of a general committee by the Speaker, a most useful one. I am anxious that such a committee should be appointed; and I think that the functions pointed out in the twenty-one preceding clauses could be very well discharged by such a committee. I allude, particularly, to the division of the House into panels. But I would suggest that, instead of the general committee selecting the particular committee, they should ballot (without requiring the presence of the Members) for those who are to constitute that particular committee; and I would also propose that, after balloting a list of seven, they should ballot a supplementary list of seven other Members, which latter list should be kept sealed up, and only opened in the event of any one or more Member or Members of the first list being objected to, and the objection being declared good. In that case, the name objected to should be struck off the list, and the first name on the supplemental list be substituted for it. With respect to the questions of law that might arise, I think the only mode of escaping from the inconvenience of the existing system would be, to adopt the proposition made a few years ago by the committee conducted by the Honourable and Learned Member for Liskeard; that of appointing assessors learned in the law. Those assessors would soon authoritatively settle all disputed questions; and then the Members of the House, with the assistance of such assessors, would be perfectly qualified to dispose of the cases that might be brought before them. Here, there is not only a question of opening the register, or a question of beneficial interest; but there are many other questions, — all of which, however, resolve themselves into questions as to the construction of the Act, so as to enlarge or contract the franchise. It may be very easy for the selected committee to discharge some duties; but if the duty were imposed upon them of selecting the trial committee, which would give away the seat to one party or the other, the House would so ruin their character that neither the one side of the House nor the other would place any confidence in their decisions. But these are not the only objections. I object to the arbitrary power of appointing the Gentlemen to serve upon the election committees. We all know that it is a disagreeable duty; but all are willing to take their chance of being called upon to perform it, — though they would object to being called upon imperatively, and at whatsoever inconvenience, by other Members, to undergo this onerous and painful restraint: or if we give this tyrannical power, we shall enable the committee to press into service, on long and difficult cases, any Gentlemen that they think ought to serve; and if excuses are to be listened to, what endless irregularities and jobbing will be produced! Are we to throw extra duties upon those Members of the House who are conversant with the laws? If so, they would be subject to render services which could not fairly be required of them; and if these calls are not to be made, then the House is not in a situation to dispense with the appointment of assessors. Indeed, the whole question is, whether we ought not to adopt the suggestion of the committee on the proposal of my Learned Friend the Member for Liskeard, and appoint permanent assessors? I, for one, am decidedly favourable to such a course.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — Sir, I think my better way will be to answer questions as they arise; otherwise I shall forget them. There have been two speeches made on that side of the House; and I shall begin with that of the Honourable Member for Nottingham (Mr. V. Smith). He asked why I did not give the Speaker the power to insist upon Members serving on these committees? Now, we do not find any deficiency of Members, undertaking the voluntary duties of the House; —there is no difficulty in finding Members to serve on the committee on private business, or on the Standing Orders Committee, or on others having difficult duties to discharge. What induces individuals, now, to discharge these extra duties? The desire of forwarding the public service, and the anxiety for distinction. Nay, what has recommended the Right Honourable Gentleman (Mr. Lefevre) to the chair of this House, but the exemplary manner in which he had assisted in conducting the private business of the House?

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

Depend upon it, that if you place confidence in this election committee, you will have its duties discharged without party feeling; and sure I am that six Members of the House in whom implicit confidence can be placed may be found. If you fail, you can then impose the obligation; but, in the first place, try the principle which has hitherto induced Members to serve on committees equally troublesome. The Honourable Member for Nottingham also objects, that leaving the names of Members on the table for approbation will appear invidious. To this I answer, if the House be satisfied with the choice of the Speaker, so am I; although I opposed his election, I am as willing to abide by his decision, as if my Right Honourable Friend (Mr. Goulburn) now filled the chair.

[Cries of "Hear, hear, hear!"]

Now I come to the Honourable and Learned Member (Mr. O'Connell), who is opposed to the principle of the Bill, and does not seem to be able to forget that he wished to remove the jurisdiction from this House. That may be a fair proposition to be discussed on the third reading; but now that we are in committee, I only ask you to proceed to the consideration of the clauses, as if the jurisdiction is to be continued in the House. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman has said that twenty-three committees have tried the question as to opening the register, and that all of these decided the question according to their party bias. This is a confirmation of the view of the Noble Lord. And if such be the case, can there be a stronger condemnation of the evils of selection by chance? If what the Honourable Gentleman said be true, that twenty-three committees were selected by chance, yet that each of them decided according to the preponderance of party feeling, can anything more strongly condemn the present system? I will venture to say that, with my system of selection, you will not have twenty-three committees so deciding. What, then, does the Honourable and Learned Gentleman say to induce the House to let the jurisdiction go out of it? Why, that there is another question — a question of value; and that the revising barristers of long standing decide one way, and that the barristers of more recent appointment decide another. This shows that party influence sways others who are not in this House, as well as those within it. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman tells us that so predominant is party feeling, that the barristers decide the same question different ways. But if it be true that the old barristers decide one way, and the new barristers another, — and that the barristers appointed by one Administration decide one way, and barristers appointed by another Administration decide the other, — is not that a conclusive reason why the House should pause, before it parts with its jurisdiction? If we allow this, — if we deprive ourselves of our legitimate privileges, — the sooner we shut that door the better.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

Then the Noble Lord opposes all chance; and I am asked why I do not allow the Speaker to name the particular committee as well as the permanent Committee of Selection? I answer, because, if the Speaker were to name the particular committee, he would be brought too much into immediate contact with our party discussions. I think, however, that the Speaker would make a fair selection of the six, and that then he should be relieved from further responsibility. I wish, and believe, that the Speaker would choose three Members from each side of the House; they might not be thought by Members on either side quite so eligible as if all had been chosen from their own party; but they would be generally admitted to be capable; and I think that it would not be fair to throw upon the Speaker the immediate responsibility of selection. Then the Noble Lord would permit a choice of Members, partly by chance and partly by selection. He is not adverse to the selection of the first committee; but he wishes to divide the House into panels, and to make use of the ballot. But how would any good be effected by this? And how would the parties know how to object to the first seven drawn, if they did not know that those who would supply their places were less objectionable? And is there to be given a power of objection from party or personal interest? If so, the challenge would be almost useless.

LORD HOWICK. — I would only permit of challenge on cause shown.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — But the last point touched upon by the Noble Lord is the most important; — I allude to the appointment of assessors. That is a grave question. I think it might well form a question under the Registration Bill, whether, if we are determined to have a court of appeal, we would employ the judges as assessors on election committees? But, as the Noble Lord has now brought forward the question of the appointment of assessors, I must say that I entertain the strongest doubts upon the subject. If a permanent body of assessors should be attached to the committees of the House, they will have most important duties to perform in one Session out of five or six, but will have no onerous duties to discharge in the others; and the result then will be, that the House, discovering that able men are labouring only one year out of five, will say, "Let us find for them some other duties;" and the House, as a consequence, would lose credit with the country; for it is already thought that there is a disposition in the Members of the House to shrink from the discharge of important legislative duties not connected with party. I do not speak of one side or of the other; the evil may arise from the balanced state of parties;—but when questions the most important are under consideration, — such as relate to the criminal law, or to the regulations of prisons, — Members ask, "Is there to be a division upon this?" and if they are answered in the negative, — though the question may involve interests the most important in a financial, jurisprudential, or commercial point of view, — Honourable Gentlemen are very careless in the discharge of their duties. And with this feeling existing, if we appoint these assessors, it will be said, Why not refer the private business to them? — why not give them all Bills to look over, instead of passing them through a committee of the whole House? — and so on, till we resolve ourselves into a mere political debating society, losing our hold upon the confidence of the country, which would think we were unwilling to enter upon our legislative duties. I am sure that if Honourable Members would apply themselves to the subject, they would be able to understand questions of election law. I, for one, though I have every respect for the bar, do not look upon a wig or gown with any degree of reverence; and I think that a plain country gentleman, without making any mystery of it, can find the meaning of an Act of Parliament well enough. If you turn your minds deliberately to the consideration of the election law, you will be able to do this; but if there were assessors appointed, they would never do it; for you would say, — "We are but jurors; the assessors will direct us; to find out the law is a tedious duty, and we need not do that which we have paid a man to do for us." In fact, if there were assessors, there would soon be found other duties for them to perform. The Learned Gentleman (Mr. Buller) has said, that ninety-nine out of every hundred gentlemen qualified to act as chairmen at quarter sessions would be competent to decide on points of election law; and I see no reason why the decision of them should not be left with those who are admitted to be competent. I recollect when young Members applied themselves to the conduct of public business, and qualified themselves for distinction, less by speeches on the debates than by attention to the committees; and I believe, that if the Members of the House do not presently discharge this more urgent duty, they will paralyse the House, injure its character with the public, and prevent the younger Members from qualifying themselves for higher duties afterwards.

Mr. C. BULLER. — Sir, as the Right Honourable Baronet has gone at some length into the question of the appointment of assessors, it may be necessary that I should answer one or two of the arguments advanced.

I concur in much that has fallen from the Right Honourable Baronet, with regard to the indisposition of the younger Members of this House to do the work which they ought to do; and also, with the Right Honourable Baronet's want of reverence for lawyers. I think that a country gentleman, or chairman of quarter sessions, might be perfectly competent to judge of such questions as those which would be referred to the tribunal proposed to be established; but then he must apply himself to the subject; and even then, a man, coming only once in his lifetime to the consideration of such cases, could not be so well qualified as a man whose every-day habit it was to deal with such matters. It is not the wig and gown that make the judge, but the habits of judicial thought and decision. It is not so much legal knowledge that is wanted, as a permanent judicial character. I do not desire to see Members taken to-day to serve on a committee, and be turned adrift the next day to make room for another, composed of men of equal merit and competency, perhaps, but who, like their predecessors, never have had their minds directed to the subject before. That is a system which I do not wish to see continued. If we were to turn to men who are not Members of this House, should we not, according to usual practice, turn to those who are in the profession of the law? Should we select officers of the army and navy, however clever they might be, for this business? Surely, then, it would be better to take men, who are to act as judges, from the ranks of barristers than from any other class of men. I wish to see the assessor established as the permanent chairman of the committee. Under the proposed system a committee on one day would be summoned to decide on certain points of law; they would get their minds a little sharpened to legal practice; they would become acquainted, to a certain extent, with the law of evidence and of election, and with the manner of managing judicial business; but then, on the next day, these very men would be turned adrift, and no advantage would be derived from the knowledge so acquired by them,—another committee being appointed to do the same business. Thus there would be no permanency or uniformity. Now I am not underrating the value of either intelligence or honesty; but intelligent and honest men, experience has proved, are constantly contradicting each other's decisions. Intelligence and honesty, alone, can furnish no security for permanence and uniformity of decision; on the contrary, the most singular crotchets and palpable contradictions might emanate from very honest and intelligent men, in the absence of a knowledge of the law. A legal friend of mine, the other day, rather irreverently said, that the intolerable length of the proceedings of the committees arose from their ignorance of election law, and that he had to explain the law over and over, to one committee on one day; and the next day he went before another committee, when he was compelled to beat it, in the same way, into their heads. Such would be the case under the proposed plan.

SIR R. PEEL.—By chance.

Mr. C. BULLER.—By chance? Why, if the same committee were not kept together, each succeeding one would have to learn the election law. Everybody in this country does not make a study of the law of election; and I will venture to say that very few men in this House have done so. The lawyers, therefore, would still have to teach the committees what the law of election really is. For that reason I want to see a permanent assessor appointed, and received as the chairman and authority of each successive committee on all common points of law. As to our not thus obtaining credit with the country, for the manner of attending to the business, I think that danger would not be averted by having shifting committees and fluctuating tribunals; for they would never discharge the duty satisfactorily, and the same complaints would still be made. Sir, the Right Honourable Baronet thinks, if these assessors were appointed, the House would shift off a great many duties from its own shoulders to theirs. But there are many duties which nobody discharges at present, that it would be as well to have some persons to attend to. For instance, might not these assessors be employed to see whether the draughts of various Private Bills are consonant with the existing laws, before they are presented to the House? There are 658 gentlemen in this House, who feel that it is equally the duty of all of them to attend to such matter;—and for that very reason it is not attended to. If these assessors were appointed, and should have time on their hands, and abilities unemployed, I do not see why they should be suffered to waste their time and energies, if they could be made useful to the House and the country, for fear that but little business would be left for the Members of this House to do. I regret, with the Right Honourable Baronet, that there should be any ground for complaining of inattention to the general business of the House; and I am of opinion that, putting aside all reference to party feelings, there is quite enough to occupy the Members of this House, both old and young, if they chose for a while to look above party considerations,—without calling on them to devote themselves to such matters as these, which I think are perfectly extraneous and foreign to the proper duties of a Member of Parliament. The objections to the appointment of assessors are various, indeed: some wish them to be Members of the House; and others, that they should not be so: some are for having them appointed by the Speaker,—a proposition which is strongly opposed by others. I can only say, that so long as some plan is adopted which will give something like permanency and competency to these tribunals, I care not by what precise means the principle is carried out.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — Sir, with regard to the suggestion which has been thrown out by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman who has just sat down, I will say that, although it is perfectly true that the assessors, having nothing to do after the first Session of a new Parliament, might then be employed in other business; yet, that would be the very way to divest them of their judicial character. I very much doubt that the judgment of such an assessor would have that weight which the Honourable and Learned Member seems to think it would have. What influence, for instance, could a gentleman, quitting the ordinary course of law, and taking the office of assessor for one year, only, out of a rota, have upon the mind of such a man as my Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Exeter? There is another reason why I shall object to assessors; and that is, because it is much easier to introduce them than to get rid of them afterwards. Let us begin with the committees without the assessors; and hereafter, if we find that such a change is necessary, let assessors be introduced. With regard to "private business," I cannot help saying that it is a question for consideration whether that ought not to cease to be a legislative business altogether?

SIR ROBERT INGLIS. — My objections to the plan of appointing assessors are simply these; — they must have some authority, or they must not. If they are to have authority, they will interfere with the jurisdiction of the House; and if they are not, they will be a useless incumbrance to the proceedings of the committees. If it be proposed that they shall have any powers conferred upon them, I consider that such a course ought not to be adopted, because I think that the surrender of the jurisdiction of the House may very fairly be objected to. I do not concur, therefore, in the proposition for their appointment; and although I feel the difficulties pointed out by the Noble Lord in the plan of the Right Honourable Baronet, yet I think that no better plan has yet been devised, and that the House ought to give it a full and fair trial.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I, for one, desire the jurisdiction in these cases to be within the House. I agree and assent to the committees, composed as they would be by the Bill of the Right Honourable Baronet opposite, if the questions referred to them are to be of such a nature as will call for decisions on cases of alleged bribery — decisions as to the conduct or misconduct of returning officers: all these matters, and some others of a similar nature, are questions which properly may be referred to committees of a constitution like those proposed; and I believe that such committees, without any assessor, would decide fairly and properly. But I think that disputed questions, or decisions of revising barristers, ought to be taken to a distinct appellate court. At the same time, I agree with the Right Honourable Baronet opposite (Sir R. Peel), that if the assessor should decide hitherto undecided points of law in a way that might be disagreeable to the majority of the House, there can be no doubt but the House would take upon itself the decision of those doubtful points, and, by passing a law, would settle them according to its own views. The conclusion to which I come, therefore, is, that, if those two classes of cases — first, appeals from the revising barristers' courts, and, secondly, the decision of disputed points of law — were taken from the committees, the main objects for which assessors would be appointed would be removed. I therefore am perfectly willing to abstain, now, from any remarks of a general nature, and to assist the Right Honourable Baronet in making these as impartial and fair a tribunal as can be at present devised, reserving to myself the right of objecting to the Bill on the third reading.

SIR CHARLES GREY. — As far as the Bill of the Right Honourable Baronet, the Member for Tamworth, goes, it would certainly produce fairer and better tribunals than those before which, at present, the questions of controverted elections come; but it appears to me to fall very short of what it is desirable to attain; and though it might be a prudent course not to endeavour, at present, to obtain all that could be wished, still there are some urgent matters to which, in order to show the country that the House is taking the whole subject into its consideration, it would be wrong not to advert on the present occasion. Every person who has spoken has agreed in condemning the confusion which is caused by conflicting decisions on points of law in controverted election cases; but none has seemed to consider how entirely and voluntarily the House is, itself, the cause of the continuation of this state of things. By the present law, there are, for the purposes to which the Bill has reference, a number of tribunals, every one of which has co-ordinate power, and all of which are obliged to decide mixed questions of law and fact. Is it possible that there should be consistent decisions in such cases? Hence the first cause of complaint; and I beg to ask whether some means cannot be devised for separating questions of law and questions of fact, and for excusing these committees from pronouncing decisions upon the former? I agree in the opinion that there is not a Gentleman in this House who is not qualified, if he will take the trouble to acquaint himself with it, to give fair decisions on points of election law. But still the main cause of complaint — the principal defect in the present system — a defect which it is absolutely necessary to cure — is, the total want of one tribunal which is competent to pronounce final decisions. If the proposed general committee of elections should have the power of pronouncing something like a final decision, it would get rid of the evil of fluctuating decisions, and be the means of removing the dissatisfaction which at present pervades the public mind.

Mr. WYNN. — I certainly think, Sir, that no more inconvenient course could well have been adopted, than that, upon the single point, whether or not the Speaker should appoint the committee of selection, we should go into the whole principle of the Bill; yet I must admit that nothing appears to me to be more natural than that, connected as the different parts of the Bill are together, Honourable Members should be drawn into arguments on those separate points, upon which their decision on prior provisions must depend. With respect to the particular clause before the committee, I am decidedly friendly to the manner in which it proposes to appoint election committees. I do not apprehend any of the difficulties which have been suggested; and I think that six Members of the House can appoint the seven who are to form the committees, much better than if such appointment were left with the Speaker. The question as to the composition of the court of appellate jurisdiction is one which will require a good deal of consideration. It might be judicious to appoint, for this purpose, a court somewhat similar to that which the judges hold on questions of taxing; the decisions of this court should be annually laid before Parliament; and, if any of their decisions should be found to be conflicting and inconvenient, they might be corrected and settled by legislative interference.

Mr. VILLIERS. — It is admitted, on all hands, that the plan proposed by the Right Honourable Baronet is a decided improvement on the existing system. It is also generally agreed that it would be most desirable to have an appellate court to decide questions disputed before the revising barristers, and which afterwards come, under the present system, before election committees of this House. I do not think there can be much difficulty in agreeing on the constitution of such a court. It would determine four fifths of the business usually brought before the election committees; and all that remains is, to decide upon its form and constitution.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Sir, after listening attentively to the previous discussion, it appears to me to be desirable that these two remedial measures should be provided:—First, a great deal more certainty, than now exists, in the previous decisions with respect to the voter's claim to the franchise; and with this view we should have a tribunal (whether in the way of a court of appeal or otherwise), to decide upon the right of voting, with more uniformity, — and that should be a permanent tribunal. The other question is, as to what should be the constitution of the court to decide upon petitions presented to this House, complaining of an undue election. The course of the discussion has been to separate these two questions; and by separating them, a great deal of light is thrown on the question of assessors. My Honourable Friend the Member for Wolverhampton has just argued that, if we had a court by which these questions relating to the franchise were to be settled, much of the labour of election committees might be removed; and I think it probable that we might be enabled, under such an arrangement, to find a fitting tribunal within the limits of this House, to try the much more contracted questions which would then arise in contested elections. I was at first disposed to think it useful to have assessors; but I must own that, on considering the matter further, I see many objections to that plan; and I must object to the principle of decisions upon election petitions being made by any others than Members of this House. If we could decide the question in this way, we should have, in the first place, a permanent tribunal with respect to the rights of voting; and in the second place, an improved mode of trial. I do not see that it is necessary or proper that these two objects should be contained in one Bill, as in the Bill now before the House. I think that it would be better for the Honourable Member for Liskeard to take the clauses with respect to the court of appeal, and put them into a separate Bill. If there were such a Bill, I should vote against the principle that those professional persons whom it is proposed to nominate as assessors, should act as chairmen in election committees. I do not say that I should come finally to that decision; but, for the present, I would prefer trying the other mode, as being one which will not render it necessary to ask for the assistance of others than Members of this House. A difficulty has occurred to me with reference to the practical operation of the clause now before the House, and the clauses dependent on it. I refer to the general and the select committees. I think it would be very difficult to obtain a general committee which should, for any length of time, agree in the selection of a select committee. I can conceive, that if the House were divided into five panels, who had only to choose one select committee, a very good select committee might be chosen; but when there are a great many of such committees to be chosen, — as, for instance, at the commencement of a new Parliament, — it would, I think, very soon be found that differences of opinion would arise; that the six Members of such select committees would be very easily chosen, but that there would be some difficulty in choosing the seventh, because he must necessarily belong to some party or other; and so the appearance of impartiality would not be obtained. Now, it seems to me that a better plan might be adopted, — one which I will now suggest, though, as I have not yet consulted any one upon it, it may, no doubt, be open to many objections. I would suggest that there should be a division into panels, as proposed by the Right Honourable Baronet, and that they should choose six Members of the proposed select committee; but that the seventh, or chairman, should be chosen out of a separate list of forty or fifty Members previously selected for the purpose, and placed alphabetically on such list. The six Members having been duly chosen, I would propose that the first Member on the alphabetical list should, as a matter of course, be taken as chairman, — and so on with the next, and the next, until the whole list was exhausted; after which it should be recommenced. This plan, it appears to me, would insure the services of persons of experience to be chairmen of such committees; at the same time that all selection on the score of party would be avoided, inasmuch as the next name on the list, of whatever party the Member might be, would be that necessarily taken. I only throw this out for consideration; and, in the mean while, I would suggest to the Honourable Member for Liskeard to incorporate his plan of an appellate court in a separate Bill.

Mr. C. BULLER. — I am perfectly willing to adopt the suggestion of the Noble Lord. I have listened attentively to this discussion, and I confess that I have been a good deal staggered with reference to the expediency of appointing legal assessors. It must be borne in mind that, when I first proposed the appointment of assessors, the Honourable Member for Bridport had not suggested the adoption of the principle of an appellate court. Since that very valuable suggestion was made, however, the necessity for assessors has become very considerably diminished. The appointment of the appellate court would so materially diminish the duties of the election committees as to render the appointment of assessors less necessary. With regard to what has been thrown out by the Noble Lord, I am disposed to concur in it, with the exception that I think certain Members of this House might be fixed on as permanent chairmen of election committees. A certain number of Members might be selected as eligible for the office (without salary, of course), and they could select one of their own body to act as chairman in each particular case. Suppose six permanent chairmen were to be appointed with this power.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — The proper time for discussing the question of the appointment of chairman will be, when we come to the clause relating to it. I have not the slightest objection to the principle of the appointment of a court of appeal from the decisions of the revising barristers. I have not the least wish to adhere to the details of my own plan, — feeling, as I do, that, after all, the real difficulty will consist in the appointment of the seventh member of the proposed committee. I am wholly unprejudiced and unprepossessed on the subject, and shall be happy to attend to any suggestion; but I think the fitting time for any such discussion is when we come to the proper clause.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I have no objection to that course.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I beg to suggest to the Honourable Member for Liskeard that he should endeavour so to arrange the introduction of his proposed Bill and its progress, that it might proceed pari passu with the present Bill, and the third reading of both come on at the same time. One circumstance I cannot help remarking,—that not a single word has been said, on either side of the House, in favour of the present system.

The clause was then withdrawn.

Mr. RICH and SIR CHARLES GREY severally withdrew amendments of which they had given notice.

Clauses 23. to 41. were then agreed to, with verbal amendments.

Clause 42.

On this clause being put, —

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said: — I will now propose the introduction of certain words in this clause which may open the discussion on the proposal I made a short time ago with a view to establish a permanent list of chairmen, to be placed alphabetically, and taken in rotation. It appears to me that that proposal has some very obvious advantages. In the first place, it provides against any interruption to the machinery of the Bill. So long as the number is seven, it is manifest there will be a difficulty as to the seventh man; and this difficulty, I apprehend, is done away with by having a list of chairmen to be taken in rotatory order. In the next place, you have a list of persons whose minds are directed to this particular subject, — the trial of election petitions, — without incurring the disadvantage, to which the Right Honourable Gentleman adverted, of having legal gentlemen not being Members of this House. I am not of opinion that they ought, necessarily, to be members of the bar, but they should be persons whose experience and knowledge of the subject qualify them for the situation. It is evident that there can be no security for the possession of those qualifications, if the selections are to be made from the 658 Members. But, according to my proposal, you would have a list of men who have studied the subject, and are competent to guide the committees. I submit to the House that it would be worth while to consider the propriety of inserting words in this clause to embody the proposal I have made.

SIR R. PEEL. — I have no objection to the Noble Lord's principle; but, before we enter into a discussion upon it, I think it would be necessary that we should understand more clearly what the practical details of it are to be. For instance, a good deal would depend on the extent of the committees. If we could not say what number of election committees would be required, the list of chairmen, as suggested by the Noble Lord, might be too numerous, or too few. If too few, the difficulty is obvious; and, if too numerous, the number of efficient Members to serve on those committees would be diminished.

Mr. C. BULLER. — I certainly feel disposed to support the principle of the Noble Lord's amendment; but, likewise, I am sensible of the difficulty suggested by the Right Honourable Baronet with regard to the number of chairmen.

Mr. KELLY. — It appears to me that the proposition of the Noble Lord would lead to a very valuable improvement in the Bill of my Right Honourable Friend, while it would obviate the objections that have been urged to the election of the seventh Member by the general committee. The difficulty with regard to the number of chairmen to be nominated does not appear to me very great. On the assembling of Parliament, after a general election for instance, the number of election petitions is very soon known to the House; and the general committee, if the discretion were left to them, could adapt the number of chairmen to the number of committees. But I regret the Noble Lord has not stated more fully the nature of his amendment.

Mr. WYNN. — I conceive the question is altogether too important to be thus incidentally discussed; and I beg to suggest that the Noble Lord's amendment should be embodied in a distinct clause.

SIR G. CLERK. — The only difference in the plan now proposed is, that the seventh member is elected beforehand. If we are to have a list of chairmen, I think that it should be named by a Committee of Selection.

Digitized by Google

Mr. WARBURTON. — I am clearly of opinion that it would be best not to specify any particular number of chairmen, but rather to leave that to the general committee.

SIR E. R. SUGDEN. — Sir, it strikes me that it would be a great improvement upon the proposed plan, if, after the six members of committee were chosen as already settled, the general committee were to name a certain number of Gentlemen, from amongst whom the six would, by ballot, elect one who should then constitute the seventh member of the committee; thus the number would be complete. I do not press this proposition, but leave it merely for the consideration of my Right Honourable Friend. I think that its effect would be to obviate an objection with the least possible departure from the Bill as it stands.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I agree that no definite opinion need be given as to the numbers to be chosen by the general committee. I consider that at a future stage of the measure it will be easy to frame a clause to effect the object which which I have in view.

The clause was then agreed to.

The remaining clauses of the Bill were then severally put, and agreed to, with verbal amendments.

SIR C. GREY. — Sir, I gave notice of my intention to move an additional clause; but a conversation which has taken place has cast a doubt on my mind whether I ought to bring it forward at this time. Certainly, I should like to know the feelings of those Honourable Members who took part in that discussion, before I decide upon doing so. I understand, from what has taken place to-night, that the House has determined to reserve to itself the power of deciding on all points relating to controverted elections. I find that much is expected from the proposed court of appeal from the decision of the revising barristers; and that this will remove from the election committees many of those matters upon which they are now called on to decide, and upon which such opposite and conflicting opinions are so frequently pronounced. But if this be the view of Honourable Members in agreeing to this measure, it appears to me to be somewhat inconsistent with the principle upon which the Bill proceeds, — namely, that the House has determined to retain the jurisdiction to itself, of deciding upon all matters relating to disputed elections of its own Members. My object is to get rid of the very great inconvenience we have experienced from the conflicting decisions upon points that arise before election committees. Now, to effect that object, it appears to me that the first thing to be done is, to constitute a tribunal, having an authority superior to the ordinary tribunals, whose duty it should be to reconcile these conflicting decisions, and to establish some uniform principle of practice. Whether the decision of this tribunal should be final or not, or whether there should be another tribunal — a committee of the House — to decide whether any matters that might be decided by them ought to be taken up, and such decisions considered by the House, is a point which I will not now offer an opinion upon; but, on first looking at this Bill, my wish was, that the general committee should be a tribunal of this nature. If the very weighty business which the Speaker has to deal with would allow him an opportunity of attending to such matters, his authority would be — I should say — the most preferable of any, to decide upon all points that might arise productive of these differences of opinion on the trial of controverted elections: but knowing that the large amount of business, which the Speaker of this House must at all times necessarily have to attend to, would not permit this principle to be acted on, I did think that a general committee of six Members, selected fairly from the House, would form a tribunal likely to carry with it the confidence of the House and of the public; while it would be, at the same time, a tribunal as fully competent to reconcile these conflicting points as any other. If it were thought necessary, the Speaker might be empowered to take notice of, and exercise a certain degree of control over, the acts of this tribunal. Such a tribunal being constituted, the first thing to be done would be to give to the parties opposing or defending a return, the power to submit those points of law likely to be brought before the committee for their decision, before entering upon those expensive proceedings. With that view, I proposed that the candidates should have the power of stating to the returning officer, at the time of the election, any objection — any disputed point of law, not of fact — which they might consider to affect their case; and that it should be the duty of the returning officer to transmit those points to the Speaker of the House, by whom they should be referred to the general committee; and that it should be their duty to consider and report upon those disputed points. This would be giving the parties to contested elections the same power which suitors have now in suits at law,—that is, of raising a point of law on a case upon which they are going to a jury. This is the plan I would suggest; and I do not perceive what inconvenience could arise from it. I believe it would very much facilitate the trial of controverted elections, and tend to diminish the expenses which are at present attendant upon them. I rest my proposition upon this ground,—that there ought to be a tribunal superior to the ordinary tribunals, to decide upon questions of law, and to prevent their being raised before the committees who have to try the merits of the election. Having made this statement, I am ready to bring up the clause, if agreeable to the committee; or, if it be preferred, I shall have no sort of objection to defer it for the present.

Clause 5. (postponed clause) agreed to, with some verbal amendments.

Mr. CHARLES BULLER.—I am unwilling to press the introduction of the clauses of which I have given notice, if, by doing so, any delay or difficulty would be produced with regard to the progress of the Bill of the Right Honourable Baronet. I am ready, therefore, to make those clauses the subject of a separate Bill; and will, accordingly, on a future day, if agreeable to the House, move for leave to bring in a Bill to appoint a court of appeal from the decisions of the revising barristers.

Mr. WARBURTON.—I consider that to reduce the number of revising barristers, and to constitute a court of appeal from their decisions, will do much to diminish the number of contested questions; but if, by proceeding with the clauses proposed by the Honourable Member, such delay would be occasioned as to endanger the passing of the Bill this Session, I think it would be most prudent to make them the subject of a separate Bill.

SIR ROBERT PEEL.—The clauses of which the Honourable Member has given notice are intended, as I understand, to provide the means for reconciling conflicting decisions of the revising barristers. They propose to establish a court of appeal for that purpose; and to that principle I can have no objection. I, however, can give no undertaking to bring in a Bill to carry it into effect. I merely express myself favourable to the principle, and state my readiness to discuss it fairly when brought forward. But I hope I shall be allowed to go on with my Bill; and that I shall not be stopped, because a Bill for the purpose I have stated may, also, be thought necessary.

LORD J. RUSSELL.—I quite agree with the Right Honourable Gentleman, that the probability of such a Bill as that suggested by the Honourable and Learned Member for Liskeard being brought in, ought not to form an obstacle to the progress of the Bill now under consideration. My opinion, however, is, that half the benefit which may be expected from the Right Honourable Baronet's Bill will be lost, if it be not assisted in its operation by some such measure.

The House then resumed; Chairman reported progress; committee to sit again on Monday next.

WINDSOR CASTLE STABLES.

On the Order of the Day for bringing up the Report of the resolutions being read,—

Mr. GOULBURN said:—Not having been in the House last night when the Right Honourable Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) proposed the vote of 70,000*l.* for erecting stables at Windsor Castle, I am not aware whether or not any estimate was brought forward showing the necessity of applying this sum, so granted,—if it be in the nature of such a grant,—out of the revenues of the Crown for this purpose. But, whether it be a grant out of the revenues of the Crown, or out of the public funds, voted in Committee of Supply, it is equally a matter which the public have a right to inquire into. The Right Honourable Gentleman is aware that if this were a grant of the public money proposed in Committee of Supply, he would have to show an estimate of the proposed expenditure, and I think, in the present case, before calling upon the House to agree to the appropriation of 70,000*l.* out of the Crown revenues, we ought in like manner to have such an estimate before us. I do not say that the amount is too large, but that we ought to have a statement to justify us in agreeing to the vote.

Digitized by Google

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I rejoice much that the Right Honourable Gentleman is in the House to ask this question, and to receive the answer which I shall endeavour to give, I hope, to his satisfaction, and to that of every Honourable Member who hears me. The Right Honourable Gentleman has said that he was not in the House last night; but there are many now present who were here, and who will accompany me in the explanation I am about to give, and see that it is in conformity with what I stated on proposing the resolution in committee, but merely adding some information, with respect to which I was then questioned, and upon which I have since obtained information. And, first, I would call the attention of the House and of my Right Honourable Friend to the distinction, with respect to their present position, which now exists between the hereditary revenues of the Crown, and the annual income granted to the Sovereign in lieu of them. There can be no doubt, as I stated last night, that the whole amount of the Crown land revenues is, during the reign of her Majesty, public property; and that a vote of any sum out of such revenues, is tantamount, in part, though differing, perhaps, in form, to a vote of the public money in committee of this House. But there is yet another branch of those revenues, which stands in a different position, and which is administered by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. I allude to that which is derived from the sale of certain Crown property, and which, under the existing Acts, is to be applied, not as matter of annual revenue, but as principal to be re-invested in the purchase of other lands, and which might be appropriated to the enlargement of Windsor or St. James's Parks, or to any similar purpose. The funds so derived are not held as revenue, neither are they carried to the public credit. It is not proposed by these resolutions, and by the Bill which will be founded upon them, and which may hereafter be discussed, to apply any portion of that annual revenue, or income of the Crown, which would be carried to the public credit, for the purpose of building these stables; but merely to appropriate a portion of those funds which have accumulated as I have described, and which now stand in the hands of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, as the personal property of the Crown, to be re-invested in the manner I have stated. I know it may be said, "But, still, this 70,000*l.* might be re-invested in the purchase of lands, or other valuable property; and the income derived from the land so purchased would become matter of revenue, and be carried to the public credit; and thus, as you diminish this fund, so you diminish the income that might be obtained from the Crown lands." I admit this; but I stated fully, last night, the facts on which the vote rested, and have no need, I think, to recapitulate them, in order to meet this argument, now. The Right Honourable Gentleman knows well, that, on the estimates on the table of the House, we have voted money to a much greater amount for the execution of works at Windsor Castle,—almost without question, and certainly without objection. The various votes, however, so granted for the alterations and improvements at Windsor Castle, made no provision whatever for stabling; and in the course of last Session I was charged with not having provided for the completion of the original plan, by securing this sort of accommodation. In Sir Jeffery Wyatt's original plan, stable accommodation was provided; and the estimate for that part of the work was 120,000*l.* To this large expenditure we objected; and after much delay, and more minute inquiry, the proposed expense to be incurred in carrying out the plan was reduced one half. There are some Honourable Gentlemen in the House who are acquainted with the condition of the stables at Windsor Castle, and who are aware that they are not only quite unfitting for a Royal establishment, but even for a private residence. The present stables belonging to Windsor Castle are, in the first place, extremely inconvenient, being scattered over various parts of the town; and, in the next place, they are in so very dilapidated a condition as to render necessary a very large annual expenditure in repairs. I was asked, last night, what would be the value of the old materials of the present stables, if pulled down and sold, and also of the site on which they stand? Of course, I cannot state this with strict accuracy, until the materials are bought by public competition; but from the inquiries I have made, I find that the sale of the site and materials may be expected to produce upwards of 10,000*l.*, which will be applied towards the erection of the new stabling. Well, then, it is supposed that 60,000*l.* is a very large amount to be voted for providing Windsor Castle with suitable stabling. But, on referring to the expense of erecting similar buildings upon a much smaller scale, I find that the expense has been very nearly as great. The cost of building the Royal stables at St. James's was between 50,000*l.* and 60,000*l.*; and that, without any riding-house. It is a part of the present plan to provide a riding-house at Windsor; such a building being necessary to enable her Majesty to take horse-exercise in bad weather, — frequent horse-exercise being necessary to her Majesty's health. I think I have fully explained that the only loss the public will sustain, as a matter of debtor and creditor account, is, that amount of revenue which might be obtained by the property being invested, and made productive. Then, Sir, as to the matter of estimate; — the only estimate that I can possibly submit is that made as I have stated — and which declares that the building of the stabling, according to the plan proposed, will cost a sum not exceeding 70,000*l.* If any Honourable Gentleman wish to examine the plans, I am willing to lay them on the table; but, when I tell Honourable Gentlemen that the estimate has been reduced from 120,000*l.* to 70,000*l.*, I hope they will see that there is a desire on the part of the Government to economise, so far as is consistent with the desire to afford her Majesty that accommodation which she ought to have, and which I am sure no Member in this House will be disposed to withhold. I trust that this explanation will be sufficient to remove all objection to the Report.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I, Sir, am one of those who will, at all times, readily subscribe to all that can contribute to the personal comfort and pleasure of her Majesty; and in that feeling I am sure the House will generally agree. I trust, therefore, that after the statement of the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer, this Report will be allowed to be brought up without opposition.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS. — We were told, last night, by the Right Honourable Gentleman, that the funds, out of which the cost of building these stables was to be defrayed, were derived from a source over which the public had no control; and we have been also told that this property might be applied to the purchase of other lands, and that it might be laid out in adding to Windsor or any other of the Royal parks. The Right Honourable Gentleman has not, however, attempted to prove that this 70,000*l.* does not come from the pockets of the public: on the contrary, we now understand that we are to vote a sum of 60,000*l.* of the public money for the building of these stables. I have no objection to offer to the estimate; but I think it right that it should be known that this money actually comes from the public, and not from the private source which the Right Honourable Gentleman would have us to believe.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I may possibly have failed, to-night, as I find I did last night, in giving a clear explanation of this matter. What I stated was, that there were two funds: that the one arising from the Crown revenues was that which was carried to the public credit; that this sum was taken from that other fund which was not to be carried to the public credit, but which was to be re-invested unprofitably, and which, if invested unprofitably, would leave no revenue at all, but, if invested profitably, would, undoubtedly, be a gain to the public. With this explanation, I will leave the case in the hands of the House.

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON. — I am sorry to see the day on which anything appertaining to the proper keeping up of a national monument like Windsor Castle is to be made a matter of cavil, come the funds from whence they may. I rejoice that this project is about to be carried into execution; but I do think it is not becoming in a great country like this to carp about an outlay of 60,000*l.* for the purpose of providing suitable stabling, and in order to complete a royal residence such as Windsor Castle.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS. — It is not my wish to raise anything which can be denominated "a cavil." My object is simply to ascertain the sum which the public will be called on to furnish.

Mr. WAKLEY. — I intend to move that the sum be reduced to 50,000*l.*; for I consider that a grant of 70,000*l.* for the mere erection of stables is an extravagant expenditure, which the present state of the finances of the country does not warrant. I move, therefore, that this sum be reduced to 50,000*l.*

The SPEAKER. — Who seconds the amendment?

The amendment, not being seconded, was not put.

The resolution, "That a sum, not exceeding 70,000*l.*, be applied, out of the land revenues of the Crown, to defray the expense of erecting stables and stable offices contiguous to Windsor Castle," was then reported, and agreed to; and Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr.

Chancellor of the Exchequer, Lord John Russell, and Mr. Baring.

Bill "to authorise the Application of Part of the Land Revenues of the Crown for the Erection of Stables and Stable Offices contiguous to Windsor Castle," presented, and read a first time; to be read a second time on Monday next, and to be printed.

PAPER DUTIES BILL.

Considered in committee, and reported; further consideration of Report on Thursday, the 20th of June; Bill, as amended, to be printed.

BRICK DUTIES BILL.

Committee deferred till Thursday next.

SUPREME COURTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Further consideration of Report deferred till Monday next.

REGISTRATION OF ELECTORS BILL.

On the Order of the Day, for the committee on this Bill, being read,—

COLONEL SIBTHORP said:—I have several clauses to propose to this Bill; but in consequence of the absence of the Attorney General, I suppose it will not be proceeded with. That Honourable and Learned Gentleman has, on previous occasions, when this Bill stood on the paper, been absent from the House,—by which absence of his, much inconvenience has been occasioned; and it would certainly appear that he wished to shirk the subject. I should like to know on what day this Bill will really be brought on?

LORD J. RUSSELL.—If we proceed with any Registration Bill, my Honourable and Learned Friend the Attorney General will most probably discharge the order for the present Bill, and bring forward another on the subject.

COLONEL SIBTHORP.—The Noble Lord had much better at once admit his intention of not proceeding with the Registration Bill at all.

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON.—It would be a very great convenience to the public to know the subject of the Bill that is to be proceeded with, or whether there is any intention on the part of the Government, or of the Noble Lord, to take any steps whatever on the subject? and, if so, whether during the present Session?

The committee on the Bill was then deferred till Friday, the 14th of June.

DOUBLE AND TREBLE COSTS BILL.

Considered in committee; to be reported this day.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

Committee deferred till this day.

CHARTISTS.

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON.—I now rise to move for a Return which, although, in my opinion, a perfectly reasonable and proper Return, I understand it is not the intention of the Government to grant. The papers I require relate to matters of a very serious character, and of the mischievous results of which we do not, at present, know the extent. I hope, therefore, that the Noble Lord will state to the House the reasons that influence him in refusing to produce them. My motion is, That an humble Address be presented to her Majesty, that she will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House — Return of any communication received by her Majesty's Secretary of State for the Home Department from the various local authorities in England and Wales, relative to the assembling together and arming of certain persons denominating themselves Chartists.

Upon the question being put,—

LORD J. RUSSELL said:—It must be obvious to the House that it is impossible for me to comply with this request, as the papers moved for are confidential communications which have passed between the authorities of the country and the Home Office, perhaps involving various parties, and giving reasons why certain persons should be prosecuted; and if communications of this nature were not to be considered as private and confidential, it is quite impossible that the business of the Home Office could be carried on.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I do not think the Noble Lord's answer is at all satisfactory. My Noble Friend (Lord Dungannon), I am sure, has no wish, in moving for these papers, to throw any impediment in the way of the Home Office, but rather to assist the Noble Lord in putting down those disturbances, which have become so dangerous and alarming in their character. I think the information called for is such as might be properly produced; and unless the Noble Lord can get up and say that the country is now going on well, and that there is no further cause for alarm, I must consider that his refusal to produce these papers is influenced by something behind the curtain of which we are not cognizant. If the Noble Lord will not accede to the motion, I think, at least, he ought to make a statement to the House on the subject to which it refers.

Mr. WAKLEY. — I hope that the Noble Lord will make a statement to the House, after what has been said, of the arming of the Chartists in different parts of the country. At the same time, I agree with the Noble Lord, that it is impossible for him, consistently with his public duty, to lay before the House the papers which have been called for by the Noble Lord opposite, and which must be regarded as confidential communications received by the home authorities. The accounts which have been given of the arming of the people are, I have no doubt, grossly exaggerated; for I cannot discover, from the inquiries I have made, nor do I believe, that any large amount of the people have endeavoured to obtain by violence that which might be much more easily secured by calm reason. I think, therefore, the Noble Lord should state to the House the true accounts he has received as to the state of the country, in order to dispel the alarm and apprehension which, I believe, does exist in the public mind upon the subject.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — With regard to the general statement which the Honourable and Gallant Member opposite and the Honourable Member for Finsbury consider I ought to make on the subject, I can only say, in addition to what I have already stated, that many threats were made by certain reckless and frenzied persons of what was to take place in the course of the Whitsun week. There certainly were several meetings held in the course of that week, at which large numbers of persons attended; but I am happy to say that their proceedings were of a much more orderly and reasonable character than, judging from the previous statements, we had reason to expect. I have, only to-day, seen the officer in command of the northern district, who informs me that he is better satisfied with the condition of that district than he has been for some time past.

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON. — It was my object, in moving for these Returns, to obtain, if possible, some information that might prove satisfactory both to the House and to the country. I should be glad if something more definite could be obtained from the Noble Lord than the statement he has just made. I have, however, some satisfaction in hearing that the present aspect of the country is not so alarming as has been apprehended. The Honourable Member for Finsbury supposes that very exaggerated statements have been put forth on this subject. I believe that, as regards some parts of the country, that may be true; but I know this, — that in my own neighbourhood — that with which I am connected by property — there did exist very considerable cause for alarm not very long since, and that, had it not been for the yeomanry corps, who were then on duty, very serious results might have occurred. I will not, after what I have heard, press my motion.

Mr. FINCH. — I believe that the accounts of the arming of the people have been greatly exaggerated. I understand that arms have not been manufactured to any such extent, or for any such purposes, as have been stated.

The motion was then, by leave, withdrawn.

PETITIONS FOR PRIVATE BILLS COMMITTEES.

Mr. Brotherton added to the committee.

BILLS OF EXCHANGE.

On the motion of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Act (1 Vic. c. 80.) read.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Pursuant to my notice, I now rise to move for leave to bring in a Bill to make perpetual the Act of 1 Victoria, cap. 80., to exempt certain bills of exchange and promissory notes from the operation of the usury laws. This is a measure of the greatest commercial importance, and is brought forward at the urgent request of many of the most influential members of the commercial body. By the Bank Charter Act, all bills not exceeding three months' date, are exempted from the operation of the usury laws. Now, it will be in the recollection of Honourable Members, that, in the Session before the last, I brought in a Bill to extend that exemption to bills of twelve months' date; and, upon this ground, — that it was quite clear that there were many commercial transactions to which the clause in the Bank Charter Bill would not apply, by reason of the narrow limit of the exemption; and that the benefit which the commercial world had a right to anticipate from the operation of that clause would be incomplete, if it were not extended to bills of a longer date. The Bill I so introduced met with the approbation of this House; but, in its progress through the Lords, the operation was limited to two years; and, if it be not renewed, it will expire in the year 1840. I believe there is no difference of opinion, either in or out of the House, as to the benefit which has resulted from this Act; and I can have no hesitation in saying — from my own knowledge of circumstances which occurred during the late commercial difficulties of the country — that, if it had not been for the relaxation of the usury laws, which this Act allowed, those difficulties and embarrassments would have been infinitely greater than they were. I would appeal to the commercial world as to the operation of the Bank Charter Act at that time, and as to the benefits which have resulted from the course that has been taken upon this subject, as a justification for my now calling upon the House to carry out its own original intention; for, in the proposition I am now about to submit, I am doing no more than asking the House to affirm its own principles. I move, Sir, for leave to bring in a Bill to make the Act 1 Vic. c. 80. perpetual.

Upon the question being put from the chair, —

Mr. PRYME said: — I cannot help regretting that the Bill is not to be so extensive as I know it is the wish of the commercial world that it should be. There is but one opinion among men who have paid any attention to this subject, — that is, that the usury laws should be totally repealed; and I hope the day is not far distant when that principle will be carried out to its full extent.

Mr. WARBURTON. — The Bill of the year before last was introduced with the approbation of, I believe, all commercial men; and I know that a very considerable degree of benefit has resulted from it. The exemption which it allows was of the utmost importance during the late commercial crisis, and has been the means of saving many commercial houses from bankruptcy. Perfectly approving of the very prudent course which the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer has adopted on this very important subject, I shall give my cordial support to his Bill.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I agree with the Honourable Member for Cambridge (Mr. Pryme), that it would be advantageous to the country if the whole of the usury laws were repealed; — that is my opinion; — and I would, most willingly, introduce a measure for that purpose, but that I am afraid, in doing so, I should be risking the good which I expect from a partial abolition.

The motion was then agreed to. Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Mr. BARING, and Mr. WARBURTON. Subsequently, —

A Bill "to make perpetual an Act of the First Year of her present Majesty for exempting certain Bills of Exchange and Promissory Notes from the Operation of the Laws relating to Usury," was presented, and read a first time; to be read a second time on Monday next, and to be printed.

CANADIAN EXPENSES.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — Sir, previous to the House being called upon to enter into a discussion of the Canadian question, it was my intention to have moved for Returns of the expenses incurred by the mission of Lord Durham to Canada, and also of the incidental expenses occasioned by the rebellion in those provinces. I understand that the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer proposes to lay before the House some important matters connected with this subject; but, as I may not have an opportunity, when those matters shall be brought forward, of putting the question to the Right Honourable Gentleman, I wish, now, to ask him whether the 35,000*l.*, which has been stated as the cost of the Canadian mission, includes the whole expenditure? I want to know the exact amount of the incidental expenses incurred in putting down the rebellion. I believe it will be found that the actual expenses incurred are considerably greater than they have been stated at. Does the Right Honourable Gentleman object to give us a detailed and connected account of all those expenses? If they really amount to no more than 35,000*l.*, or if there be any reasonable objection to give such an account, I am bound to rest satisfied with the Returns which have been already laid before the House.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — The Honourable and Gallant Member gave a notice for a Return of the expenses of the Earl of Durham's mission to Canada, and other expenses incurred in putting down the rebellion in that colony. With regard to the former, the Return which has been given contains the best information which the knowledge of the Government enables them to give on that subject, even up to the last farthing; and if it should hereafter appear, that one farthing more than it already contains ought to be added to that account, I will take care to lay a Return of such further expenditure on the table, without motion. With regard to the second Return, — that as to the expenses incidental to the putting down the rebellion, — I have already told the Honourable and Gallant Member that there is some difficulty in preparing it now. The Honourable and Gallant Officer must, as a military man, well know that, if he were in command of a body of troops in Canada, he could not, in a very short time after the close of the campaign, state the exact expense he had incurred in putting down the rebellion, separately from that which would be required for keeping up the general service of his regiment. I have laid before the House the best accounts that it was in my power to give; and I can only add, that so soon as any further information is received by the Government, it shall be produced.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I beg to thank the Right Honourable Gentleman for his explanation, which, I assure him, is perfectly satisfactory.

BEER-HOUSES.

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON. — I moved, early in the Session, for a Return of the number of beer-houses licensed for the sale of beer during the last year. I have not yet seen that Return, and I believe it has not yet been made.

Mr. BARING. — Many Returns have been laid upon the table, classed together. If the Noble Lord, on inquiry, should find that the Return he speaks of has not been produced, I will take care that it shall be immediately made out.

JOINT TENANTS VOTING (IRELAND) BILL,

LORD BROUGHAM. — Why should it be put off?

The MARQUESS of SALISBURY. — I wish to move some amendments.

The committee (which stood appointed for this day) was then accordingly put off to Monday next, and the Lords summoned.

SPANISH LEGION.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — I can assure your Lordships that, in endeavouring to obtain some information with respect to the settlement of the claims of my unfortunate countrymen who have recently been employed in the Spanish service, I do not mean to oppress or embarrass the Noble Viscount opposite. But I conceive that the information which I am about to call for is of a nature which the Noble Viscount must, himself, feel to be of very considerable interest and importance. I wish to know what steps have been taken to meet the claims of those unfortunate officers who were induced to enter the Spanish service in consequence of the Order in Council which Ministers authorised, and by which the operation of the Foreign Enlistment Act was suspended. From some cause or other those claims have not been taken up, as they ought to have been, by those who might have been expected to have shown the greatest interest in bringing the matter to a conclusion. On this subject I have received a letter from a large meeting of officers, which was recently held in Dublin. It is as follows: —

My Lord, — At a late meeting, in this city, of several of the officers who belonged to the late Spanish Legion, and to whom large sums are due for arrears of pay by the Spanish Government, I am directed to request your Lordship, who has upon so very many previous occasions shown the interest you take in those that have belonged to the legion, will, in your place in the House of Lords, upon the first convenient opportunity, ask of some member of the Government whether any effectual measures are in progress for the payment of the legion. There has been a commission sitting in London to investigate the claims of men and officers during the last year, and no one officer or man now in this country knows anything about its proceedings. You, my Lord, will be the means of rousing the public to insist that some pledge will be given by the Government that justice must be done by the Spanish nation to a number of men that went out to Spain under their auspices, and the minute of the King's Honourable Privy Council. For your uniform kindness and attention to the legion and their interests, I am directed to return you their grateful acknowledgments; and am, for myself, with profound respect, your Lordship's very obedient servant,

JOHN JENKINS.

Summer Hill, Dublin, May 20. 1839.

One of the officers of the legion has also placed in my hands a very curious document, which has been given by the commission to some of the claimants. It may well be called "General Alava's bank note." It presents an imposing appearance; it is headed, "Office of the Royal Spanish Commission," and proceeds as follows: —

By virtue of authority vested in us by her Catholic Majesty, we the undersigned commissioners for adjusting the claims of the late British Auxiliary Legions of Spain, do hereby declare that the sum of 9*l.* 4*s.* is due to Henry Guyer from the Spanish Government. This document is transferable, by indorsement, at the will of the party interested.

It is signed by M. Ximenes, the Spanish commissioner, and Colonel Wetherell, and contains the words, "Confirmed, Miguel Alava, her Catholic Majesty's Minister." What is the use of such a document? Is there any place or time stated when the money is to be paid? It bears no interest; it is mere waste paper; and to show the state of necessity to which these unfortunate men have been driven, I need only mention the fact that, for these certificates, containing the acknowledgment of the debt due to them, they are actually taking 1*s.* 6*d.* and 2*s.* in the pound. This bank note of General Alava is a mere delusion; it is no such liquidation of the claims as I understood to be in progress. If the Spanish Government were changed to-morrow, I should like to know whether General Alava would be responsible for this document? There can be no further excuse for delaying the settlement of these claims; the accounts, as I understand, have already been audited, and a sum of 260,000*l.* is admitted to be due from the Spanish Government, but not a shilling can be obtained. Under these circumstances, I venture to say that, if the Noble Viscount cannot bring the Spanish Government to do justice to these men, it is a discreditable position for this country to be placed in. General Evans and General Alava are both, at the present moment, in this country; and this, therefore, appears to me to be a propitious time for the interference of her Majesty's Government; and the Noble Viscount can hardly tell me that he has exerted all his influence in behalf of these claimants. The Noble Viscount has unfortunately, now, for a long time, held his present office, and lately he has been incapable of doing much good either for our foreign or domestic relations; but, for the Minister of a great nation like this to say that, in a case of mere justice, affecting his own countrymen, "he cannot do anything," is so extraordinary a statement, that I scarcely believe that it can be made. I stand up as an officer for these unfortunate and ill-treated men, many of whom have served under the illustrious commander behind me; and I must say that, if their claims are not treated as they ought to be, — if their representations are thrown aside and neglected by the very Government which encouraged them to volunteer their services, — it will be most disgraceful to all who are concerned in the proceeding. I hope, most sincerely, that some plan will be speedily devised for the purpose of assisting these ill-treated individuals. In conclusion, I beg to move for a Return of all claims of officers and men of the late Spanish Legion which have been presented; a Return of all those claims which have been liquidated, and in what manner; and an Account of those claims which remain unexamined.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I am anxious to give to the Noble Marquess all the information which I, myself, possess on the subject. With respect, however, to the motion, it is impossible that I can accede to it, because Government cannot be cognizant of what is done by a commission not appointed by them. That commission has no connection with the British Government, nor with any department of the state. It originated with the Spanish Government, and is not under the cognizance of this Crown. I, therefore, can state nothing as to the proceedings of that commission.

The motion was then withdrawn.

POOR LAWS AMENDMENT ACT.

EARL STANHOPE. — My Lords, I beg leave to read the following petition, to which I alluded yesterday evening.

To the Right Honourable the Lords Spiritual and Temporal in Parliament assembled.

The humble petition of the guardians of the poor of the parish of St. George the Martyr, in the borough of Southwark, in the county of Surrey, Showeth, — That your petitioners are extremely anxious to represent and complain to your Lordships that the Poor Law Commissioners, in their several Reports made to the Secretary of State, have misrepresented facts, and made statements in reference to the parish of St. George which are totally incorrect and untrue.

That your petitioners consider it to be highly important that such misstatements should be contradicted without delay, because they are calculated to mislead your Lordships and the public at large as to the injurious or beneficial effects of the Poor Law Amendment Act.

That whereas the Poor Law Commissioners have stated, in the pages of their Fourth Report, that a saving had been effected in the expenditure of the parish of St. George of 47 per cent., as compared with the average expenditure of the three years immediately preceding the introduction of the Poor Law Amendment Act; that such statement has been proved to be untrue by Mr. John Day, one of the guardians, in his analysis of those accounts.

That in the amended statement made by the Poor Law Commissioners to Lord John Russell they have admitted themselves to be wrong, and that their published Report laid before your Lordships is not correct.

That the difference between the expenditure, as stated in the Poor Law Commissioners' Report, and their corrected statement to Lord John Russell, amounts, on the average of the three years referred to, to no less a sum than between 6000*l.* and 7000*l.*

That your petitioners also have to assure your Lordships that the amended statement referred to, made by the Poor Law Commissioners to the Secretary of State, is, like the Report itself, incorrect and untrue.

The statement of the Poor Law Commissioners being to the effect, that although they find themselves wrong in calling the saving 47 per cent., there is yet a saving of 40 per cent.; while the state of the parish and the books themselves show the contrary to be the fact; and that, so far from any saving being effected, the amount of the poor rate levied in 1835, previous to the introduction of the poor law, was 3*s.* 8*d.* in the pound; whereas the amount of rate in 1838 was, with the increased assessment, equal to 4*s.* in the pound, or an increase in the burden of the ratepayers of about 1600*l.* in the year 1838, as compared with 1835, previous to the introduction of the new law.

That your petitioners have also further to complain to your Lordships, that important serious misrepresentations have also been made in reference to their parish in the Third, as well as in the Second, Report of the Poor Law Commissioners.

That in their Reports certain evidence is stated to have been given by some of the officers of their parish, which was found upon inquiry to be untrue; and that such evidence as the Poor Law Commissioners published and put forth in their Reports was not given by those officers, and was, therefore, untrue.

That your petitioners, in their experience of the administration of the relief under the new law, have found its working, in proportion as it has been carried out, to be injurious both to the ratepayers and the poor; and, therefore, cannot but regret that an impartial examination has not been taken from those whose experience has enabled them to see its defects, as well as those who, from private prejudice or interested motives, were partial to its operation.

Your petitioners, therefore, humbly pray that your Lordships will, in future, be pleased to place no reliance or dependance whatever upon the Reports or statements of the Poor Law Commissioners, now proved to be incorrect and false. And your petitioners also further pray that the Poor Law Amendment Act may be repealed or effectually altered, because it is unjust in principle and oppressive in practice.

And your petitioners will ever pray, &c.

Signed on behalf of the board,

CHARLES ANDERSON, Chairman.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I am entirely ignorant of the facts of this petition; and so, I believe, are the Poor Law Commissioners. I would suggest, therefore, that they be furnished with a copy of the petition in the first instance.

EARL STANHOPE. — It may be printed.

LORD BROUGHAM. — When the Noble Earl consents to have — say 500 — petitions printed, that fact furnishes 500 reasons for letting the commissioners have one. It should be recollected that these men are put on their trial on unknown charges; and I therefore hope the Noble Earl will not refuse this request, particularly as he has behaved so fairly, in these matters, generally speaking.

EARL STANHOPE. — Always.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I shall say "always," if the Noble Earl do not make this glaring exception to his rule.

EARL STANHOPE. — I have no objection that it should be printed for the public; but I will not show any special favour to those "dictators," whose power I consider quite illegal.

SCOTCH CHURCH.

The MARQUESS of BUTE presented a petition for the further endowment of, — of inhabitants of Cumnock. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

COURT OF CHANCERY.

LORD LYNDHURST. — My Lords, I rise to call your Lordships' attention to the subject of the Court of Chancery, and to the present state of business in that court. I have, my Lords, undertaken this task with very great reluctance, but I have been urged by representations from gentlemen at the bar, practising in the Court of Chancery, — from respectable solicitors in that court, — from suitors, some of whom have been victims to the course of proceedings in it; and I consider the subject to be of such deep interest to the community at large, that I feel it to be my duty to comply with the request thus pressed upon me, and to bring forward this question, in the hope of devising some remedy for the evils complained of. I have, my Lords, been the more anxious to do so, in consequence of the Speech of her Majesty at the commencement of the Session. Her Majesty, in that gracious Speech, directed our attention — our anxious attention — (for such were the words) — to measures that were about to be submitted to us, having for their object the more certain and speedy administration of justice. Now, my Lords, there is no part of our judicial system more requiring amendment than the practice of the Court of Chancery; not merely from the position it is now placed in, but also from the immense extent of the interests involved in the judicial decisions and proceedings of that court. But, my Lords, months have elapsed since Parliament assembled, and not one single word has yet been said in this House with respect to the Court of Chancery; and no Bill, as I have been informed, is now pending in the other House of Parliament on this subject. Therefore, my Lords, I deem it to be more imperatively my duty to call to the recollection of her Majesty's Ministers that which perhaps they have already forgotten, — namely, the gracious communication so made by her Majesty at the commencement of the Session. But, my Lords, this matter did not stand therein, entirely by itself; for, adverting to that speech for the purpose which I have mentioned, I find other great and important and almost overwhelming considerations pressed upon our serious attention. Notwithstanding this, I repeat it again, we have here assembled, night after night, for upwards of four months, and not a single Bill, on any subject of the slightest importance, has yet originated with Ministers in this House, or has come up to us from the other House of Parliament. I do not mean to say, my Lords, that we are without a Government, for I see several Noble Lords opposite who hold high and responsible situations under the Crown. But, my Lords, it does not appear to me that there is any substantial difference between the position of a country having no Government and that of a country having a Government which, from negligence, or from want of vigour, or from want of power, is unable to bring forward, and to carry through Parliament, those measures which the great interests of the country require. My Lords, passing by this consideration, I beg to point out to your Lordships the course — the limited course — which it is my intention to pursue on this occasion. I do not mean, my Lords, to enter generally and at large into the considerations of the whole subject of the courts of equity. That would involve me in a discussion too wide and too entangled for the object which I have in view. That object is — to point out what I consider to be a crying grievance of the Court of Chancery, and to endeavour to apply to that grievance an adequate remedy. I hope, therefore, that I shall not be charged with taking a narrow and circumscribed view of this great subject, when I state that my object is to apply a practical remedy to what I consider to be an enormous practical evil. Having made these few preliminary observations, your Lordships will allow me state what is the actual condition of the Court of Chancery with respect to causes at this time. There are now, my Lords, upwards of 850 causes standing for hearing in the different branches of the Court of Chancery. There are 550 between the Noble and Learned Lord on the woolsack and the Vice Chancellor; and there are other 300 before the Master of the Rolls. I am informed by persons of eminence in that court, that many of these causes have been standing for a period of three years. I am told that, in the court over which the Noble and Learned Lord on the woolsack so ably presides, and in the Vice Chancellor's Court, the average period,—after a cause has been set down and is ready for hearing, — before it is heard for the first time,—is two years and a half. Yes; the long period of two years and a half elapses before that step is taken. I am further informed that, with reference to cases before the Master of the Rolls, a period of a year and a half elapses prior to the first hearing. Therefore, taking these courts together, I may be considered as not making an outrageous statement, when I say that, on an average, two years elapse before a cause comes to be heard.

Now, my Lords, this is the grievance of which I complain. It is a grievance of great magnitude; and, in order that your Lordships may understand the nature and effect of that grievance, allow me to explain, what has, however, frequently been explained in this House,—namely, what is the meaning and nature of a hearing in the Court of Chancery. A hearing does not finally dispose of a case. In the greater number of cases, a decree is pronounced, by which certain other proceedings are directed to be taken. Thus, for instance, an issue may be sent to try a question of fact in a court of law; or an inquiry on certain points may be sent before the Master. The cause, then, is in the Master's office a year, — perhaps more. The cause is next brought back again into the court upon the Master's report; and if both parties are satisfied, — which is the most favourable supposition that can be made, — then the cause is again to be set down and heard on further directions, and then the interval occurs as before. If it happen — which is the more common case — that the parties do not concur in the Master's report, then exceptions to it are taken. Those exceptions are set down to be argued. A long time elapses before the argument and hearing come on, and a still longer before the cause is decided. I think that the statement which I have already made is sufficient to satisfy your Lordships of this; — that, if the cause involves any very considerable interest, and is at all of a complicated description, several years must elapse between its commencement, the issuing of a subpœna, and the final decision of it. The mischief is the delay which takes place between the first hearing of the cause and the time when the court is able to have it called on for decision. Allow me to point out the obvious inconveniences which arise from this course. Your Lordships are aware, in the first place, that, in a cause in the Court of Chancery, all the parties who are interested in the matter must be on the record either as plaintiffs or defendants. In every important cause there are many parties in this situation. What is the consequence? Parties on the record die; one life falls in, and then the cause abates. It must be revived by a new bill. It often happens that some three or four of these abatements take place in the course of a suit. Your Lordships will see, at once, the evil this occasions in a suit. Another evil, which is felt by all the courts in equity, is the "term fee." There are now 850 causes standing for hearing in the Court of Chancery. Suppose that each cause takes two years before it is heard, the mere term fees will amount to 7000*l*. This, however, is not the only evil; for not only is the term fee to be paid to the officers of the court, but also to the solicitors of the parties; so that, in proportion to the prolongation of the period before the cause is heard, is the amount of term fees paid to the officers of the court and to the solicitors. Then, the situation of parties changes, and thereupon it becomes necessary to file a supplemental bill, in order to shape the case to meet the new state of things, previous to the hearing. That, however, which is the greatest grievance of all, not only upon the public, but also upon the Court of Chancery, is, that the lapse of time renders motions necessary. These are supported by affidavits on one side, and opposed by affidavits on the other; and in them are involved questions of the most entangled description. All these motions arise out of delay. Accordingly, in the time of Lord Chancellor Hardwicke, he said, "I will not hear your motion, but the cause. The cause must be in progress, so that I can dispose both of the cause and of the motion at once." But the state of the business in the Court of Chancery in the present day will not allow of such a course; for parties would evidently invent motions for the purpose of advancing their own causes to the prejudice of other suitors.

I have endeavoured, my Lords, to state these evils with as much moderation as possible. I appeal for confirmation of what I have said to my Noble and Learned Friend on the woolsack, to my Noble and Learned Friend opposite (Lord Brougham), and to my Noble and Learned Friend the Master of the Rolls. I ask them, one and all, whether, in the statement which I have just made,—grievous as it may appear to be, to many of your Lordships,—there is any exaggeration? I rather think that I have understated the case, because I have not entered into details in treating upon it. The fact is, that the evil is great, is grievous, is intolerable. I could state cases of this description over and over again; but I will be content with stating one. A party is entitled to an annuity, charged upon property. That property is encumbered with debts. The trustee is unwilling to discharge his duty, and appeals to the Court of Chancery for protection. Years elapse; and, in the mean time, the family of the party entitled to the annuity cannot draw a farthing from it. They are, in consequence, either involved in want and misery, or are induced to raise money upon usurious interest, — a practice ultimately leading to their ruin and destruction. It is the duty of your Lordships to provide, not only for the effectual, but also for the speedy administration of justice. One of the earliest and one of the most revered maxims of our law is, that justice must not be sold, — that justice must not be denied, — that justice must not be delayed. The delay of justice, as my Noble and Learned Friend opposite, on one occasion, pointedly remarked, is equivalent to the denial of justice; and I believe that there are cases in which it would be much better for a party to have a decision at once against him, than to be hung up for years for a decision of his claims, even when the decision may be favourable.

I beg, my Lords, that, in the observations I have made, and am about to make, I may not be understood as casting any reflections on the noble and learned personages now presiding in the courts of equity. I am sure that the evil is not to be ascribed to them. My Noble and Learned Friend on the woolsack, and my Noble and Learned Friend the Master of the Rolls, I know, perform their duties most meritoriously and successfully. I make the same observation with regard to their learned coadjutor, the Vice Chancellor, who devotes all his time, all his learning, and all his energies to the business of his court. I do not ascribe the evils now prevailing in the different courts of equity to them. I believe that they work most successfully in the administration of justice. I believe that they devote more time to and exercise more energy upon it than any country ought to require of its judges. I am one of those persons who think that a judge should not occupy his mind totally with the administration of justice. There is not any pursuit which does not tend, if a man devote himself exclusively to it, to narrow the intellect and to contract the understanding. A judge ought to look abroad, and to cultivate literature and science, for the lights they so acquire reflect back on the bench, and afford force and vigour to the judgment they pronounce.

When I say that this state of things is not to be ascribed to any want of learning or energy on the part of the learned judges now presiding in the Courts of Chancery, I will endeavour to fortify what I have just stated by a reference to facts. I will not go back for them to a period more remote than twenty years. I will read an extract from a return made to an order of the House of Commons, and your Lordships will see from this what has been the state of things for the last twenty years. I find that in the year 1819, at the close of Michaelmas term, 950 causes were set down for hearing. I find that in the year 1824 the number was 906. I find that in the year 1829 it was 700. I find that in the year 1834, at the period when my Noble and Learned Friend opposite retired from the woolsack, — a period to which I shall presently advert more particularly, — it was only 491. I find that in the year 1835 it was 630, in a following year 746, then 773, and now it amounts, as I have already told your Lordships, to 850. You will find, my Lords, from these returns, that on an average of twenty years, the Court of Chancery has always laboured under the same aggravation of business, so far as regards the amount of causes standing for hearing. I have adverted, my Lords, to the period of 1834, as the period when the smallest number of causes was standing for hearing. I ascribe this fact, in part, to the able superintendence of my Noble and Learned Friend opposite (Lord Brougham), and to the extraordinary powers of despatching business enjoyed by Sir John Leach, who heard more causes in a given time than any judge who ever preceded, and I believe than any judge who happens to have succeeded him. I ascribe it also to another circumstance of the greatest importance; — I mean, to the fact that, in the year 1832, just two years before the period I am speaking of, the bankruptcy business, which formed no inconsiderable portion of the business of the Court of Chancery, was transferred to another tribunal. Yet, notwithstanding this, such has been the increase of business in this court, that the arrears are again augmenting, and there still remain 850 causes for hearing. I know, my Lords, that it has been said — and I am most anxious to vindicate the Court of Chancery on this point — that these evils did not exist in the time of Lord Hardwicke. I beg leave to observe that that is an entire mistake. There are various publications of that period which describe the Court of Chancery of that day as obnoxious to the same complaints which are made against it at present. In these, it is stated, that great delay prevailed in its process, and that there was the same want of decisions experienced, and, in a word, the same evils — which are now complained of. One of these publications was entitled "Animadversions on the Court of Chancery, and was published in 1756. But the answer usually given to this is, that the Court of Chancery was then in a different state from that in which it is now. It is true that there is now an additional judge in that court. It is true that the Court of the Master of the Rolls has been new modelled, and that the business in bankruptcy has been removed from the Court of Chancery. This is well worthy of consideration on one side; but then, again, on the other, the business of the court has, doubtless, greatly increased. According to a statement made from the woolsack by my Noble and Learned Friend about three years ago, it appears that the number of causes now set down for hearing exceeds, by three times, the amount of those set down for hearing in the time of Lord Chancellor Hardwicke. It appears that petitions — a very important part of the business of the Court of Chancery — now exceed the number of petitions in Lord Hardwicke's time by seven to one; and that the motions, which at present form so heavy a part of the business of the court, now exceed the motions of Lord Hardwicke's time in the very same proportion.

I think that this statement, which I have taken pains to verify by looking at the original documents, forms a complete answer to the complaints we hear made against that court; and to the averment that a Lord Chancellor, having the learning, vigour, and energy of Lord Hardwicke, would soon get rid of the accumulation of arrears now pressing so heavily upon it. That accumulation of arrears, my Lords, has existed as long as the Court of Chancery itself. We are told that when Wolsey gave up the great seal, there was an accumulation of arrears in the court over which he presided. I learn from the life of his distinguished successor, Sir T. More, that he devoted himself day and night, at the commencement of his judicial career, to get rid of that accumulation. We know, by reference to the celebrated speech of Lord Bacon, in the reign of James I., that the same evil existed in that day, and we know, also, that he pointed out a way in which he conceived that it might be remedied. We have also a right to draw the same inference from a statement of Bishop Williams, who said that, whilst he presided in the Court of Chancery, he had decided more causes in one year than had been decided in seven by any of his predecessors. I say nothing as to the satisfaction which his decisions afforded, either to the public or to the parties affected by them. In the time of Charles I. we find the same complaints respecting the delays and arrears in the Court of Chancery brought forward in the House of Commons. We find that Lord Coke declared that there was more business in the Court of Chancery than the Lord Chancellor or the Master of the Rolls, with all their industry, could possibly dispose of. We find, likewise, that a Bill was then brought in, and read a first time, for the purpose of appointing two additional judges to the Court of Chancery, to get rid of that arrear of business. What was the history of that Bill? It was abandoned; but for what cause is not clearly ascertained. In the reign of Charles II. we find, by reference to Roger North's Life of his brother, Lord Keeper North, that the same complaints then existed: indeed, he attributes the death of the Lord Keeper to the vexation which he felt from his inability to keep down the arrears of his court. The same complaints continued to be repeated in the time of Lord Somers, of Lord Cowper, and of Lord Hardwicke. There are persons now present, my Lords, who can carry back their recollection 50 or 60 years, and who can inform your Lordships that just the same complaints have continued from their earliest memory down to the present hour. Why have I stated all this, my Lords? To show that there is nothing personal in my motion — to satisfy you that there is no hope, by any mere change of the judge, to get rid of the evils of the system. Your Lordships are therefore bound to apply a remedy to these forthwith. Why it has not been sooner applied, it is not for me to say. A trial to apply a remedy was made, as I have already stated, in the time of Charles I., but was abandoned, subsequently, for some reason or other which has not been distinctly transmitted to us. But is that any reason why we should give up, for ever, the hope of a remedy? Here is a number of causes too great for the number of judges to hear and decide on. Here is a mass of business beyond their physical strength and energy to perform. No three judges could do it; and it goes on regularly increasing. What would you do, my Lords, in any similar affair? Take, for instance, the case of manual labour, where a quantity of work is to be executed in a given time. If you had not hands sufficient to execute it, you would put on more hands; you would call for greater power, until you had got power adequate to the emergency. Now, I maintain that the judges should be above their work, not oppressed by it. No man can decide rightly, who is always teazed to decide speedily. A judge ought to have time for deliberation, in order to satisfy the public and the parties on whose interests he is called to decide. When I had the honour of holding the great seal, I acted on this principle. I found it impossible to keep down the arrears in the Court of Chancery. The first thing I did was to see whether I could remodel the court of the Master of the Rolls. At that time, the Master of the Rolls sat four times a-week, but only three hours each evening, or about 12 hours in the week. In substance, he did not sit 12 hours in the week; for the Court of Chancery broke up earlier than it would have otherwise done, in order to let the counsel practising in it attend before the Master of the Rolls at six in the evening. I applied to my Honourable and Learned Friend the late Sir John Leach on the subject, and I asked him if he would give up his evening sittings, and sit in the morning, as the other judges were accustomed to sit. I owe it to the memory of that learned judge to say, that he agreed — promptly and at once — to my proposition. The effects of that change were soon discovered. The arrear was kept down; but still the measure was not, I contend, adequate to the occasion. I thought that it was necessary that something further should be done. I considered that permanent improvement was hopeless without some legislative measure. I therefore brought in a Bill on the subject, which I renewed in a subsequent Session, and which fortunately received the unanimous approbation of your Lordships. It was supported by those great lawyers, Lord Tenterden and Lord Eldon, and I believe by Lord Redesdale also. It went down to the other House of Parliament. I know not from what cause, — whether it was from party or from some other cause, — but my Noble and Learned Friend opposite took no part in it, — still, I believe, from some motive of party, it was there violently opposed. An Honourable and Learned Gentleman, a former colleague of mine, Sir C. Wetherell, distinguished himself by the strenuous opposition which he directed against it. The terms which he applied to the Bill itself, and to the prospective judges under it, were of the most extraordinary description. By the by, I recollect, now, that my Noble and Learned Friend opposite (Lord Brougham) did take a part in that opposition. He said that it would make the office of the Lord Chancellor a sinecure — that the Lord Chancellor would have nothing to do but to take the fees of his office, and that he would soon devolve all it duties upon his deputy. Whatever was the motive, the opposition to my Bill was carried on for two days with great vigour. A vote was, however, come to, at last, in its favour. In a few days afterwards the demise of the Crown took place, and the Bill was in consequence abandoned for the Session.

I merely state this to show that my views on this subject have always been the same, and that I have long thought that there were more causes to be decided in the Court of Chancery than the judges of that court were physically able to decide. Then, my Lords, if this be the case, you ought to have, and you must have, a greater number of judges. It is true that it may be a great inconvenience to establish a new court. It is true that it may be an inconvenience to the bar, and many persons connected with it. But let us look, my Lords, at the other side of the question. There may be an inconvenience such as I have stated; but that inconvenience bears no proportion to the evil which exists now, when causes of the deepest importance to the interests of families remain unheard and undecided from the want of sufficient physical force in your judges. One objection to the Bill which I proposed was continually brought forward in the other House of Parliament, and to it I will beg leave for a moment to advert, because it is material. At that time the business of bankruptcy was connected with the Court of Chancery — it occupied a considerable part of the time both of the Chancellor and Vice Chancellor; and a gentleman, now no more, who took the Court of Chancery under his protection for a great many years, always said, — "Why not detach the business of bankruptcy from the Court of Chancery? That will give sufficient relief; it is unnecessary to appoint an additional judge; the object will be attained by relieving the court of its bankruptcy jurisdiction." I objected to that course, — first, because I thought the relief would be altogether insufficient; and, next, I objected to it because I considered that the appellate jurisdiction in cases of bankruptcy was better vested in the judges of the Court of Chancery than in any other tribunal. The experiment, however, was tried by my Noble and Learned Friend opposite (Lord Brougham), very soon after he accepted the great seal. I say not whether the appellate tribunal that has been substituted in lieu of the Court of Chancery be or be not an improvement, because it has nothing to do with the present question; but I advert to the separation of bankruptcy from the Court of Chancery for this purpose, — to show that I was right in the opinion I then gave, that the relief thus afforded would not be sufficient. The separation, undoubtedly, relieved the Lord Chancellor and the Vice Chancellor to a considerable extent; but the increase of business was more than commensurate with that relief; and the change made no alteration, substantially, in the amount of the arrears. Three years ago my Noble and Learned Friend on the woolsack brought forward his measure for the reformation of the Court of Chancery. I then again suggested, for the last time, what I have always considered the most simple and appropriate remedy; but I was told that my measure was too narrow — that it was mean and scanty in its object — that my Noble and Learned Friend had a much more extended scheme to new model the Court of Chancery and the whole appellate jurisdiction. His plan, however, did not meet with your Lordships' approbation, — nor even my Noble and Learned Friend's opposite. My Noble and Learned Friend on the woolsack would not accept my proposal; and nothing, from this time to that, has been done upon the subject.

I will tell your Lordships what has always been my course upon this question. The Noble Viscount opposite (Melbourne) introduced the other evening the phrase "progressive reform," which most appropriately described the course which I have always pursued with reference to the Court of Chancery. My object was to carry into effect all the orders of the commissioners, which were directed to simplify the progress of the cause up to the time of hearing; but I said, and most naturally, — "What is the advantage of expediting a cause up to the time of hearing, unless you afford further facilities for hearing? The cause would stop, though at another stage." Accordingly, the next step I took was to suggest further means for the hearing of causes. There I was defeated. My next object, as I over and over again stated, would be, if that immediate object had been accomplished, to direct my attention to the appellate jurisdiction of the court. I considered it premature to endeavour to reform the appellate jurisdiction until I had first taken the means for reforming the great and grievous defect, — the deficiency of the power for hearing causes. When it was suggested that a new judge should be appointed for the purpose of facilitating the hearing of causes, it was met by this observation, — "What good would you do by it? You will only increase the number of appeals, and the Court of Chancery is already blocked up with its appeals." I never considered there was the least weight in that objection; for this reason: — Suppose there are 800 causes to be heard, and a certain proportion, 50, the subjects of appeal; by hearing them all, 750 are disposed of, and the other 50 remain for appeal; but it is just as well for them to remain in that stage upon appeal, as for original hearing, because they still would have been left for hearing. There is no validity in the objection, even if it applied at all: but it does not apply; for the appeals are to a very great extent disposed of. To my Noble and Learned Friend opposite (Lord Brougham) we are mainly and entirely indebted for this. When he took the great seal there was a great arrear of appeals; and when he left, there were only 26 appeals remaining, which, I understand, are now reduced to 16 or 17. My Noble and Learned Friend disposed of 140 appeals in one year. I know he sat up day and night, and worked most laboriously, for the purpose of accomplishing that object; — and that object he did accomplish. There is at this moment no arrear with respect to appeals; and, therefore, the argument to which I refer does not now apply. But it is said that the Chancellor can now devote his time to original causes. I believe that, last year, my Noble and Learned Friend on the woolsack heard between 60 and 70 causes: but I don't believe that he has lately heard many original causes. I am told that appeals are on the increase: and I know, from the state of business in this House, that it is impossible to give any effectual attendance on original causes. There are 100 appeals undecided: 40, or nearly 40, have been heard, and are waiting for judgment; and 60 remain to be heard, with only about six weeks of the Session before us.

I have now, my Lords, pointed out the evil, and what appears to me the practical remedy. What makes the want of the application of this remedy the more extraordinary, is what I am now about to mention — the state of the Court of Exchequer. The Exchequer is a court of equity, as well as a court of law; they are separate and distinct from each other. The Court of Exchequer in equity has all the machinery of the Court of Chancery — it has all the offices, all the officers, everything necessary for the purpose of constituting a proper court; but there is no judge. You have a court without a judge, as far as equity is concerned. Let me not be mistaken. My Noble and Learned Friend, the Lord Chief Baron, when he can be spared from the common law business, sits in equity; Baron Alderson, too, when he can be spared, sits in equity; and both administer justice on the equity side, to the perfect satisfaction of the bar and the suitors. But this is done to the great inconvenience of the common law business of the court; and, in the next place, not one third of the time which a permanent judge could give in equity, are they able to devote, in consequence of their other duties. Not only is this so; it is productive, also, of this great inconvenience; — there is as much common law business in the Court of Exchequer as in the Queen's Bench, — there is the same establishment of judges; how inconvenient, then, — the judges of the Queen's Bench not being too numerous, — to draw away one of the judges from the Exchequer for the purpose of administering justice in a court of equity? I have conversed with those learned persons, and they tell me that the inconvenience to the court on the common law side is extremely great. It is extraordinary that we should not have five judges devoted exclusively to the business of common law; when the Common Pleas, so greatly inferior to the Exchequer, has five judges entirely occupied with the common law business of that court. What, then, is the obvious remedy? To appoint a permanent judge on the equity side of the Exchequer. Leave the five common law judges to administer the common law of that court, and appoint an equity judge to preside over the equity side. Is not this an obvious remedy? Why not adopt it? What can be more plain, simple, and rational? What objection can possibly be urged against it? It is not the first time I have made this proposition. I have made it over and over again; but by some fatality, when the Court of Chancery is concerned, no two persons can concur in opinion, and nothing is done. But I am not wedded to this particular mode of getting rid of the evil. If my Noble and Learned Friend on the woolsack, or my Noble and Learned Friends opposite (Lords Brougham and Langdale), think any other means better calculated to attain the object in view, — if they think it better to have another judge of the Court of Chancery, instead of having a complete equity judge in the Exchequer, — I will accede to their proposition. I will do still more. I say that such is the present state of equity business, and such would be the increase of equity business, if there was the power to carry it on, that there would not be too much force if there were both an equity judge in the Exchequer, and an additional judge in the Court of Chancery. This would be attended with the additional advantage, that it would enable one of those judges to act as permanent president of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. That court will never be a completely effective court, palatable to the bar and to the suitors, until you have a permanent judge presiding in it. My Noble and Learned Friend opposite. (Lord Brougham), whenever his important avocations admit, presides there with great advantage to the suitors and the public: but that is merely temporary; we are to look forward to the future; we shall not always have the assistance of my Noble and Learned Friend in that department; and I think, therefore, one of the most important beneficial consequences of the measure I propose is, that it would give a permanent president to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. This is necessary, above all things, from a consideration to which I must, for a moment, allude. The consideration is this; — the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is conversant, not with equity alone, not with common law alone; but it has to administer Spanish law, two different kinds of French law, and Dutch law; it has to direct its attention to all these various departments. How important, then, is it that it should have a permanent president, in order that he may feel it his duty to qualify himself to administer justice in such complicated matters with satisfaction to the suitors of the court. Another practical advantage, of no inconsiderable importance, which would result from this, would be, that the bar of the learned judge would follow him from his equity court to the Privy Council. The bar would also become possessed of that information on all matters of foreign and international law, which is necessary to the sound administration of justice; there would thus be a permanent bar and a permanent judge to administer justice in one of the most important tribunals of the country. I would appeal to the Noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Lansdowne), the Lord President of the Council, who has had the opportunity of witnessing the proceedings in that court, and the nature of the business which comes before it, whether what I have stated is not correct? and whether benefits the most important would not result from the adoption of the measure which I have proposed?

fine myself, according to what I stated at the outset, to one point. I have not gone into the various considerations that present themselves as connected with the Court of Chancery. They are complicated beyond measure. But here is one evil on which I place my finger, — a grievance the most heavy that prevails in that court, — namely, the arrears of causes set down for hearing. It is to that I apply my present remedy; and I trust I shall be successful in proportion to the simplicity and singleness of my view. If I had entangled it with other matter connected with the court, your Lordships would have lost sight of my real and main object. It is because I am desirous of obtaining a practical remedy to a great practical evil, that I have confined myself to this view of the case. I know there are persons connected with the profession, who say that you should begin at the other end; that you should, in the first instance, consider the appellate jurisdiction, and new model the whole system. I answer, I will not embark in that course: different opinions exist with respect to it, and to the best means of attaining the end proposed; but if we once engage in a controversy of that kind, the object I have in view will never be attained. My Noble and Learned Friend on the woolsack, three years ago, brought forward his plan for a reform of the Court of Chancery. It was not approved of by my Noble and Learned Friend opposite (Lord Brougham). He, also, had a plan, much more comprehensive and much more extensive than my Noble and Learned Friend on the woolsack. My Noble and Learned Friend the Master of the Rolls (Lord Langdale) has also a plan for the reformation of the appellate jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery. I say nothing as to the merits of these respective plans. I do not wish to interfere in this war of giants, — I do not think myself safe within the wind of such commotion, — I wish to take a humbler course. Cautus nimiùm may be said of me: I admit, too, the timidusque procellæ; it is, because I fear the storm, that I have not taken a more extended course. And now, having pointed out what I consider the proper remedy for the practical evil which I have exposed, I leave the case in the hands of her Majesty's Ministers. I shall be asked, "Do you mean to introduce a Bill?" I answer, distinctly, "No." I might succeed in carrying a Bill through the House; but, I fear, the probability is, it would, somehow or other, share the fate of my former Bill in another place. I wish it should have a father that can better support and protect it in the warfare in which it must engage. I think my Noble and Learned Friend on the woolsack, or some Member of the Government, if they agree in the general view I now take, ought to bring in a Bill upon this subject, If they do so, the measure shall receive my most cordial support; because, I own, I am anxious for the attainment of the great object I have in view, — not merely as a member of a profession with which I have been long connected, but, above all, because I think it of the utmost importance to the interests of the suitors, and of the community at large. My Lords, I beg leave, in conclusion, to move, as a matter of form, for the Return of which I gave notice on a former occasion; namely, "A Return of the number of causes standing for hearing before the Lord Chancellor, the Vice Chancellor, and the Master of the Rolls, on the 1st of June, 1839, including exceptions, further directions, pleas, and demurrers."

LORD BROUGHAM. — In presenting myself thus early to take part in this most important discussion, I have to acknowledge, as I am always ready to do, the great ability of the statement of my Noble and Learned Friend who has just addressed your Lordships. As no man expresses himself more clearly, so I believe I may say few men think so well on any subject to which my Noble and Learned Friend applies his vigorous understanding; and on a matter which has occupied his thoughts so long, and on which his own experience is so large, and which now, for the third or fourth time, he has brought under the attention of the House, it might well be expected that that vigour would not be applied in vain. I have, accordingly, but one objection to his statement, — and that refers solely to the latter two or three sentences of his most lucid statement. I grieve that my Noble and Learned Friend does not take the matter into his own hands. I am convinced that a measure matured by him, digested under his own immediate inspection, with the lights which he has, and the assistance out of doors which he could command, would have the certainty of insuring the respectful consideration of Parliament, and every chance of its final sanction. I am not quite so sure of its fate, if it be left to my Noble and Learned Friend on the woolsack. It is true, undoubtedly, as my Noble and Learned Friend (Lord Lyndhurst) has stated, that the subject was recommended, generally, in the Queen's Speech; but so were many other matters. For my own part, I am rather alarmed that the subject was mentioned in the Speech from the throne. If it had not been referred to at all, there would, perhaps, have been a better chance of something being done with respect to it. My comfort, however, is, that it has not been the subject of a Royal Message. If it had been, I should not have been much surprised if some of my Noble and Learned Colleagues had proposed to put off the measure on the subject till the year of Grace 1842! However, as it has not been messaged as well as speeched, the Chancery reform has still a chance of being taken up within some reasonable time. It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of this question. Far from overstating, my Noble and Learned Friend has, indeed, understated the case.

My Noble and Learned Friend has mentioned the different plans which have been brought before Parliament at various times;—my own, the measure introduced by my Noble and Learned Friend on the woolsack, and the proposition of my Noble and Learned Friend the Master of the Rolls, which was never embodied, I believe, in a Bill. Having been much blamed for my own plan, I will take this opportunity of stating, that I had many reasons for not pressing on Parliament any larger measures of Chancery reform than I have propounded, and some of which have been carried into effect. One reason was this;—I had undertaken to attempt the reform of that court on a large scale; but I had a very great inclination of opinion,—I will not say before trial, but—as strong an inclination of opinion as,—speculatively and prospectively, I could entertain,—that part, and a very great part, of the delay in the Court of Chancery was owing to the neglect—God knows I cannot say the incapacity—of those who administered it;—or rather to the multiplicity of their concerns, and a habit which some of them had got into of not deciding the causes when brought before them. I am now stating—after the death of one of the greatest, perhaps the greatest, lawyer who ever lived—what I said, repeatedly, during the lifetime of Lord Eldon, and in the hearing of his celebrated brother, then a Member of the other House of Parliament,—that he had all the great faculties of a most illustrious judge, the most profound learning any lawyer in this country ever possessed, the utmost possible subtlety with which a human mind could be armed, the greatest industry and perseverance with which it is possible for mortal man to be gifted; but that he had—not originally, but—acquired, a very bad habit, which grew on him, of not attending (such is the real truth) to the arguments of the counsel who were arguing before him;—the prolixity of counsel securing the inattention of the judge,—the inattention of the judge increasing, by reaction, the prolixity of the bar,—till, at last, he decided cases at great intervals of time after hearing the arguments—not so much upon those arguments, as upon his own judgment, formed by reading the whole of the papers in the cause. That, undoubtedly, was a great misfortune both to Lord Eldon and to the profession; but it became, latterly, an inveterate habit which he could not get the better of. My opinion, therefore, is, that a judge of infinitely less learning and capacity might get through more work by applying his mind more closely to the business of the court, and adopting a more judicious arrangement; by sitting a greater number of hours each day; by acting on a maxim which might be applied to time as well as money—"Take care of the minutes, and the hours will take care of themselves;"—by coming into court, not when the clock strikes three, but regularly when it strikes ten. I stated this in the House of Commons; and it was on these grounds that I assisted in throwing out my Noble and Learned Friend's Bill. My Noble and Learned Friend is much mistaken if he thinks I did not take a share in throwing out the Bill: I took an active part against it, because I thought it a needless measure; and I took to myself the principal share of the praise or blame to which its rejection might give rise. During the recess which ensued on the demise of the Crown, I was asked whether I would renew my opposition in the event of the Bill being brought forward again? I answered that I certainly should; and the Bill was in consequence withdrawn.

LORD LYNDHURST.—I hardly remember the circumstance; but I know there was a majority of 41 in favour of the second reading.

LORD BROUGHAM—Oh! that was no very great majority; we were then in the days of efficient majorities, and 41 would have been reckoned but a small one. When I took the great seal, I was bound to act according to my own feelings of what was proper; and if I had proposed to create a new judge for the relief of my own court and my own ease, it would have been said at once, "Oh! you have, now, totally changed your opinion: you were against the creation of a new judge formerly, when you were at the bar, and had no interest in the matter; but now, when you are overwhelmed by the load of business, you confess that you were wrong and that we were right; you fly for help to the quarter whence no help was to be sought, and hasten to increase the number of judges." It was quite clear that, on this account, I could not do any such thing; but I had another reason, for my opinion remained unchanged; andfurther reflection and nearer acquaintance with the state of matters only confirmed that opinion. What, then, was my bounden duty? I apprehend no one can deny that it was—to act on my own principles, and try all means, however feeble and however inferior to those of my predecessors my own energies might be, to grapple with the giant evil and keep down the arrears, and thus prevent the business from becoming entirely unmanageable. That was the principle on which I proceeded; and, if I had failed, I would then have had recourse to the remedy of my Noble and Learned Friend, and would have become convinced that there were fatal objections against the system, not of a personal nature, and that there must be another judge. I agree with my Noble Friend, that we ought not to be deterred from adding another judge, by any consideration of expense; for the expenses incurred from the number of arrears, would much more than support another judge. The fees levied by the court—independently of the expenses of the solicitors employed by the parties, and the expenses of additional motions made in court—would more than defray the additional judge's salary. It is not very pleasant to refer to my own experience whilst I presided in the court; and it would be intolerable if I were obliged to institute invidious comparisons between myself and others; but, as it may assist your Lordships in coming to a just conclusion on the question of the necessity of additional judges, I will shortly state what I have, myself, done. When I took the great seal, there were 125 appeals in arrear. Original causes had not been heard by the Chancellor since 1814, when the Vice Chancellor's Court was created. During the first year, in order to prevent a further arrear and satisfy the suitors, I heard the enormous number of 140 causes, besides a great number of motions. The result was, that the list was gone through, and, at the end of the year, only eight appeals were set down. When I asked if there were any of those which could be heard, the reply was, "None whatever;" and if I had forced any of them on, it might have had the effect of causing an appeal in matters which would otherwise have been compromised by the parties. Thus, by a year's exertion, all the arrear was got rid of in the Chancellor's branch of the Court of Chancery, as well as all the arrear in the House of Lords. The number of appeals from my judgments in the Court of Chancery was unprecedentedly small,—only seven or eight out of the enormous amount of causes I had heard; and of these, three only were reversed. I have a right, therefore, to say, that there was no overhaste,—that the business was fully done. All this was effected under the old state of the powers of the Court of Chancery; and I sat five or six weeks in bankruptcy that very year,—there being then as much bankruptcy business as there had been under any of my predecessors. I mention these things, rather as bearing on the question before your Lordships, than for the purpose of controverting the grossly ridiculous assertions made out of doors by some members of the profession; such as that my Noble and Learned Friend, on the woolsack, is the first Chancellor since the institution of a court of equity, who has heard original causes. This has been stated by a Member of Parliament, and of the bar; yet the fact is, that Lord Eldon was the first Chancellor who did not hear original causes; the hearing of such causes having been discontinued only since 1814. Grosser, coarser, more stupid ignorance than these learned persons have been guilty of, I cannot conceive; and yet I am sorry to say that the statement was made in the presence of some officers of Court of Chancery.

LORD LYNDHURST.—No person at all acquainted with the Court of Chancery could make such a statement.

LORD BROUGHAM.—Certainly, no person acquainted with the Court of Chancery in England. It has also been said, "that my judgments were beacons which succeeding Chancellors ought to avoid." No misstatement, than this, can be more gross; the wildest imagination, the most reckless disregard to truth, cannot go further. Yet what increases, if that be possible, the utter absurdity and shameless falsity of this assertion, is, that the very same person who now talks of my judgments in this way, did,—on the 25th of May, 1838,—in a company of 4000 persons, and in my own presence, state that I was the first judge in equity who had ever—an equally gross exaggeration, God knows—shown the suitors in Chancery that they might have good judgments with speedy despatch of business together. This is the person who, because his public conduct has been commented upon by me, has now discovered that my judgments were only good, as beacons to scare future Chancellors! I pronounced no new judgment between May, 1838, and March, 1839; so that this dictum must have been uttered after a reconsideration of those volumes of judgments with which I have encumbered the shelves of the profession. When holding the great seal, I formed a determination never to lose half an hour at the beginning of the day, or an hour at the end; to avoid going to court, — for surely nothing can be more absurd than for a Chancellor to dance attendance on drawing-rooms; to avoid as much as possible Cabinet meetings, and confine myself to the judicial business. These were the means by which I got rid of the arrears. It does not at all follow that this could be done every year. It was very kindly said by my Noble and Learned Friend on the Woolsack, that this close application to business occasioned my illness and absence from Parliament; but my Noble and Learned Friend was in error. I was perfectly well in 1833, and in 1834 I had never been better in my life; it was the hard work I went through in this House in 1835, and especially when the Municipal Corporations Reform Bill was before it, which broke my health. Some of my Noble Friends opposite may be inclined to consider it as a judgment upon me; but the five or six weeks of unremitted exertion, through which I passed, — and the great pains which my Noble and Learned Friend opposite (Lord Lyndhurst) took to thwart me, and defeat the Bill, — (thus far more than repaying any service which I had rendered my Noble and Learned Friend, by causing the loss of his Chancery Bill, in 1830,) — caused my subsequent retirement from this House. If the arrears of appeals were now got rid of altogether, and the Chancellor could hear original causes, then the Chancellor would be restored to his pristine functions, — to the title of an original, not an appellate judge, — and the judicial power of the court would be increased one third. I hope my Noble and Learned Friend opposite will not suppose I am obstinately adhering to an opinion which experience has proved to be wrong; all that I wish is, that both sides of a cause shall be heard before it is decided. My Noble and Learned Friend has said that the business of the Court of Chancery has been increasing constantly and greatly since the time of Lord Hardwicke. No doubt there has been a great addition in the number of Bills filed. But I wish to press on the attention of your Lordships, that some of the sources which formerly produced a vast amount of business have been cut off. We must not look on the present judicial powers of the Court of Chancery as being the same that they were in former days: they have been very greatly increased; insomuch, that even if the amount of business in the court had been doubled, its powers would have increased in the same proportion. Thus, by the creation of the Vice Chancellor's Court, the judicial authority has been increased more than 50 per cent. within the last 25 years. I say more than 50 per cent., because the Chancellor has it not in his power to devote his whole time to his functions, as head of the Court of Chancery: his political duties, and those of the appellate jurisdiction, occupy great part of his time. My Noble and Learned Friend will bear me out in saying, that much less than half the present amount of business was in the Chancellor's branch of the Court of Chancery before the creation of the Vice Chancellor's Court. So that, by the new court, the judicial power is increased at least 70 per cent. But that is not all. My Noble and Learned Friend has made a great reform in the Rolls Court. Formerly, that Court sat in the morning only four weeks in the year, and never on Saturday evening. On an average it sat three days and a half in the week, and four hours each day, or 14 hours a week. But my Noble and Learned Friend sits six days in the week, and six hours a day, or 36 hours a week.

LORD LANGDALE. — The whole weekly time of sitting is thirty hours.

LORD BROUGHAM. — Well, thirty hours. Thus, taking into account the creation of the new branch, and the changes made in the Rolls, the judicial powers of the court have been very nearly trebled. The business of the recorder's reports is withdrawn, which used to take up very many hours; but that is a trifle, compared with the change I am about to mention. The Chancellor is relieved from the bankruptcy business, which formerly occupied six or seven weeks a-year, and he is not deprived of the power of sitting a greater number of hours, daily, than Lord Eldon was wont to sit. Taking all these things into account, I cannot exaggerate, when I say that the judicial power has been very considerably more than doubled since the commencement of the present century. That is, surely, a pretty large addition; and to this must be added the assistance which is now given in the Master's office, by an arrangement, trifling indeed, but very convenient, that saves an hour daily of the Master's time. When I came to take the great seal, it was necessary that the Chancellor should be attended at the court by two Masters.

Digitized by Google

A more useless form never existed; yet, when I abolished the custom, it was said to be a horrid innovation, to do away with the attendance of the Masters, who added so much to the dignity of the Chancellor, and aided the court so much in matters of business. If this aid were really given, it must have been given at the distance of Chancery Lane; for all that was done was, that the Masters came down to the Court, bowed to the Chancellor when he came in, received an obeisance in return, and then went back to Chancery Lane. Thus, however, at least an hour of their time, daily, was generally wasted, which, by doing away with this custom, is gained for more important duties. I thought all these changes sufficient, after I had once reduced the arrears, to prevent the business from becoming, in future, at all overwhelming to the Chancellor; and therefore I saw no reason for increasing the number of judges. On the contrary, it appeared to me that, if my Noble and Learned Friend now on the woolsack, but then Master of the Rolls, continued to preside in that Court so ably as he did, and that some arrangement could be come to with the Vice Chancellor, by which that judgeship might be abolished, and things placed in the same position as they were in the beginning of Lord Eldon's time — it did appear to me at the time I am speaking of, that it might be possible for the Chief Judge in Chancery, by means of great exertion certainly, to go on without arrears, as had been the case under Lord Thurlow, and also under Lord Loughborough. I was aware of the immense number of causes in the inferior courts. I was aware that my Noble and Learned Friend behind me (Lord Langdale) heard, at the Rolls, on the average of several years, as many as 507 causes per annum, and that in one year he actually heard 1000 causes; I was also aware that the Vice Chancellor heard a great many causes yearly; — I was aware of all this; but my opinion was not materially altered in respect of the plan I have adverted to. The making of more judges is, in my mind a clumsy, and, I will say, a vulgar mode of remedy; at all events, in contemplating any such remedy, never let it be forgotten, that it was not till after the establishment of the Vice Chancellor's Court that the increasing pressure of business began to be most seriously felt in the Court of Chancery, by reason, chiefly, of the appeals from the Vice Chancellor.

LORD LYNDHURST.— The increase of the general business coming into all the equity courts was very great subsequently to that time.

LORD BROUGHAM. — No doubt the increase in the general business was very great; but hardly sufficient, I am disposed to think, to account for the whole of the increase which then began to be so much felt. But, however this may be, still I am not quite convinced, yet, that increased exertion would not keep down the arrears in Chancery. But to an increase of judges my objection is insuperable: and among other reasons for it is the extension of patronage which would thereby be conferred on the Crown; for extension of patronage is one of those things to which I object still, — being, myself, still a Whig, whatever others may be. But, besides, I think this is a dangerous remedy, for this reason; — it is teaching a very bad lesson to judges, to tell them, that if they do not exert themselves strenuously, they will always get help from Parliament by means of a legislative increase of their numbers. I have reason to know this; I know it right well; for I had not been six months upon the woolsack before I was applied to by some of the common law judges to sanction a measure for increasing the number of judges, in consideration of the great increase of the arrears of business in the common law courts. But I said, "No, no; no more judges must be made. Let the reaction increase as the pressure is augmented, and greater exertion be made in proportion as the business to be discharged grows greater. Do this, and don't fly to that baneful remedy — that mala praxis — of adding to the numbers of the bench." This was what I said. What was the result? The arrears in those courts were got rid of; and, as I am told, there are no symptoms of similar arrears getting up again. I think this goes to show that the practice of increasing judges is a bad one; and I am only now the more confirmed and more steady in that opinion than I have been heretofore. However, I do not lay down this as a peremptory opinion: I wish the House, and especially my Noble and Learned Friend, to weigh well this part of the subject, with a view to coming to some deliberate determination on it. I come now to another point. Your Lordships must either give the new judge an ultimate jurisdiction, without appeal, — which no man will maintain you ought to do, for there ought to be no court of such a nature constituted with ultimate jurisdiction, — or you will give a right of appeal. But by this plan you will most materially increase the total number of appeal cases in equity; and these must come either to the Chancellor or to the House of Lords; for, if you follow the present practice of an appeal to the former, followed by an appeal to the latter, you will surely increase the arrears of appeals both in the Court of Chancery and before the House of Lords. Now, one of my plans, with which my Noble and Learned Friend seems to have made merry in my absence in 1836, — though not on very sufficient grounds, as it appears to me, — was — to give an election in appealing. But, under the plan of having three judges, — a Chief Judge in Chancery, a Master of the Rolls, and a Vice Chancellor, — is the new judge (let me ask) to have an appellate jurisdiction over the Master of the Rolls and the Vice Chancellor? If so, you will first fall into the same evils, to a great extent at least, with respect to delay and expense, as you suffer from at present, — I mean the evils of a double appeal. And the effects of this evil will be felt much more, by suitors in the courts below, than in the House of Lords; for the sort of appeals which take place below are numerous beyond measure, as compared with those which come up to your Lordships' House; but still, you will be overwhelmed with appeals in this House. If, on the other hand, you do not give an appeal jurisdiction to the Lord Chancellor, then parties, who may be dissatisfied with the decisions of the courts of equity, whichever of them it may be, must come immediately to this House; — a course which will amount, in many cases, to an absolute denial of justice; for the unsuccessful suitor will often sit down under a decision with which he is by no means satisfied, rather than encounter the delay and expense attendant upon an appeal to your Lordships under the present system. While, therefore, on the one hand, to give dissatisfied suitors in the equity courts no resource but an appeal to the House of Lords, will often work, under the present system of administering justice, as a denial of that justice; on the other hand, if there be no appeal at all, it will be found that the judges will at length come to act with less care. For, if there be certain classes of cases in which an appeal lies, and certain others in which it does not, judges will always apply themselves with more attention and care to those cases in which they know that their decisions are liable to come under the review of another and superior court, than they will to those cases over which they have an ultimate jurisdiction. I have, myself, had occasion to observe instances of this in the decisions, in bankruptcy, of some of my predecessors on the woolsack, who, though unquestionably very learned judges, certainly came to conclusions in some cases which displayed a remarkable inferiority in the qualities I have mentioned as distinguishing them, — as compared with their judgments in other cases, where they were not, as in the former class, exercising an ultimate jurisdiction.

My Lords, this, or something like this, must be the case, if all the courts of equity are to act without any right of appeal within themselves. Now my plan was, either to give an appeal to the chief judge in Chancery, or to come to the House of Lords per saltum, — a course to which, be it remarked, under the operation of the rest of my plan, the objections I have just made to appealing immediately to the House, as at present constituted, as a judicial tribunal, will not apply; for all appeals on minor cases would come before the chief judge in Chancery; all the important ones would come before your Lordships, presided over by the Lord Chancellor. But if the table were then to groan under an accumulation of appeals, would a stoppage take place? No; for this over accumulation would relieve itself, acting like the governor of a steam-engine, which opens a valve when the pressure is too great. Whenever the appeals became too heavy, then those suitors who wanted justice, and not delay, would go away, or would apply to the appellate jurisdiction below. Whenever, again, the appellate jurisdiction, below, became overcharged, it, in like manner, would right itself; those who wanted justice, and who did not address themselves to an appeal court only for the purposes of delay, — those, in fact, who were bonâ fide appellants, — would come before your Lordships. But it may be objected, "We should be afraid of increasing, to a vast amount, the pressure of appeals, here." My answer is, that the plan, which I speak of, gives great judicial force to this House, because the judge who presides in it would give his whole time to that duty and to the presidency of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and not to a court of his own.

I am glad that my Noble and Learned Friend has named the Judicial Committee, for it gives me an opportunity of saying, that I admit, as readily as any man, its defect in wanting a head: this was a defect in its original constitution; and I always said that you ought to have a vice-president of it, who should be paid an adequate and fixed salary. This system, I am convinced, would not have the effect of increasing the appeals either before your Lordships or the inferior courts.

Having thus stated my views of, and touched upon some of the doubts and apprehensions I feel in dealing with, this part of the subject, I now come to what appear to me to be the two most important questions of all, — I mean the question of the propriety of separating the judicial from the political character of the Lord Chancellor, and the question of a better construction of a court of appellate jurisdiction. With respect to the former point, no person goes further than I do. If it can be done, in my opinion, it ought to be done. As regards the judicial functions, the only difficulty with me is, that the Speaker of your Lordships' House, as being appointed by the Crown, can never be permitted by your Lordships to take that position, with respect to the control of the proceedings of this House, which the Speaker in the other House of Parliament, as being elected by the Commons, is invested with, and exercises there: and if the Speakership were made an independent and permanent office, and were well paid, it might soon, possibly, fall into the hands of persons who should be of no talent, but only able to do that which an automaton might almost do, namely, — to put the question on any motion, and declare whether the ayes or the noes had it, the House saving the trouble of deciding that. The Speaker of this House must, therefore, I think, be a person invested with the judicial character; he must be a judge, because your Lordships' House is a judicial body; and, as the majority of your Lordships are not lawyers, the principal part of the judicial power exercised by your Lordships must be placed in the hands of the president of your Lordships' House. This officer ought, therefore, to be a judge; but if the three judges in equity were constituted according to my plan, then this officer, whenever he saw fit, would have the power of calling to his aid, while sitting on appeals here, any one or two of the three judges in equity, below, to assist the judgment of the House, just as you occasionally, now, summon the common law judges to assist you. Now the other difficulty relates to the political position of the Lord Chancellor, and is such as to render the separation I aim at scarcely possible, I am afraid; for such a separation would be quite overthrowing what has been, from early periods, an invariable custom of Government. However, it ought to be done. It is quite anomalous to see a judge sitting in Westminster Hall, and deciding alone, — having no certain rule in the statutes, nor even uniform guidance from precedents, to help his decisions; but deciding, almost wholly upon his own discretion, governed only by his own conscience, questions not merely of the most important nature, but questions of the utmost delicacy; and this, too, knowing that he is liable to be removed by the Crown at any moment. Many cases occur, in which the interests of the Crown are directly concerned, and which are questions of the utmost delicacy for a judge, so placed, to be called upon to decide; inasmuch as the interests of the Crown are often directly involved. I, myself, very well remember a case coming before me when I held the seals, in which the interests of the Crown were involved, to the amount of 60,000*l.* or 70,000*l.*, — the question actually being, whether so much should be put into the privy purse, on account of the revenues of the Duchy of Cornwall, or not. I felt the delicacy of my situation, and suggested to the counsel for the defendant that I should be glad to have the assistance of another judge, or, if he chose, two judges. But the counsel thought it much better for his client that the cause should go on before me alone. It is quite necessary, therefore, where there are so many questions of great delicacy, not only of a political, but, also, of a personal nature, — such as questions relating to wards and guardians, to married women, and various other parties, — that the two characters of the Chancellor's office should be separated. I could tell your Lordships of Chancellors who have given political judgments in certain cases which have come before them, — judgments which did not admit of a doubt as to their political bias: these have been thought to be wrong, yet they have long been felt very difficult to get rid of, — indeed, they are hardly got rid of yet, because they form precedents. Hence, I am entirely for separating the political from the judicial functions of the Chancellor.

The second point is the construction of a better court of appeal; but I feel all the difficulty of arranging the right of appeal between the intermediate court and the court of first instance. I am inclined, however, to give it to the second of these, in order that the court of appeal may be well qualified to settle causes satisfactorily, and to do its duty with sufficient experience, and with a daily knowledge of matters of practice, — a knowledge, that is to say, which should be kept up by practice from day to day; in short, in order that that judge may establish claims to the public respect and confidence, as well as acquit himself to his own satisfaction, by his mode of discharging business. It is difficult, in my mind, to imagine how a court can be constituted properly, if the judge who presides in it sits there to adjudicate appeals alone. It is not in the law, as in the accurate sciences, where great principles and their applications, once learned, are not readily forgotten. My Noble and Learned Friend near me (Lord Langdale) is probably just as able to solve a problem in mathematics, now, as when he took his degree as senior wrangler at Cambridge; and so is my Noble and Learned Friend opposite (Lord Lyndhurst): but nothing similar to this holds respecting questions of law. Thus, I doubt, if your Lordships were to take the most experienced and able lawyer in Westminster Hall, where the statutes are so much studied and so well known, and where discretion is so much less exerted, and place him, alone, as judge in a court of equity,—whether he would not be found to have forgotten his law in a short time; and I doubt, also, whether his judgments, on such points, would give much satisfaction in general, or whether he would feel much satisfaction in his own judgments, if he did not keep up his habits of technical and practical acquaintance with the details. If he did not keep up such habits, he would probably soon quite get out of them. So much is this the case, that I remember having had to ask the opinion of Sir William Grant on a point of law, about a year and a half after he had been made Master of the Rolls; and he, with his habitual candour, said, "Probably the law is so and so; but my opinion is not worth a rush,—I have been above a year out of practice." It is highly important, therefore, that the appellate judge should not sit on appeals, alone. The judge who sits on appeals sees nothing but the great and important questions; nothing of practice ever comes before him; and that consideration is one which I think should have great weight with your Lordships. I have thus felt it to be my duty to refer to the difficulties which attend the great work of constituting an appellate jurisdiction. Your Lordships have often been asked, "Why do you not create a good and efficient appellate jurisdiction?" That object, I would observe, is much easier called for than accomplished. There have been, no doubt, many attempts, many approximations, towards it; and, in the progress of those attempts, some improvements have been really effected. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has been called into activity. Four judges sit there and hear causes: nothing is heard without them,—nothing is decided otherwise than by them: they are chosen from amongst the judges of the common law courts, the equity courts, and those in which the civil law prevails. Of those four judicial persons, although all of them are present, yet each presides in turn; they give judgment in turn; and when they differ, they deliver their opinions seriatim; when they agree, one pronounces the judgment; and, further, they adopt a practice—which I used in the Court of Chancery,—they reduce their judgments to writing. The only thing now wanting to that tribunal will be, the appointment, which has been recommended, of a permanent vice-president, without whose presence no cause should be tried, who should always preside, and who should always deliver the judgments of the court. That Judicial Committee would then be a most suitable tribunal to which to refer Divorce Bills,—an object long and earnestly desired, and never yet effected. The Patents Act furnishes, in its working, a practical evidence of the expedition and efficiency of the proceedings in that court; in the course of a morning, three or four cases have often been disposed of, which, if brought before Parliament, would have occupied as many months, with all the disgusting accompaniments of jobbing and canvassing.

In apologising for the length of time at which I have detained your Lordships, I need only say that I shall gladly assist any of my Noble and Learned Friends in promoting the great objects of Chancery reform. But before I sit down, now, in justice to myself, I feel bound to add, that when it is supposed that I have brought in no Bills for the reform of the proceedings in the Court of Chancery, a great error is committed. I brought in one Bill, which was a measure of the most sweeping change in the administration of the law of bankruptcy. It has been observed that the Court of Review is now without any considerable amount of business before it. I admit that that court is very much underworked; but it ought not to be forgotten that that circumstance arises from the excellent working of the other part of the system, which, in its effects, has greatly exceeded the sanguine expectations that I, myself, formed of them. It is because there are so few appeals from the six commissioners that the Court of Review find so little business to get through. This, I confess, is an agreeable surprise to me. I did not anticipate that the extraordinary merits of one part of the plan would have had the effect of preventing the other from coming into full activity. Experience, however, has shown that the six commissioners do more business than the whole seventy to whom that business was formerly intrusted. Then I beg further to observe, that the appointment of the official assignees is the great feature, and the greatest merit, of the change which I introduced. Those official assignees and commissioners, created by the new system, have been enabled to divide 2,000,000*l.* under old commissions of bankruptcy, which, had it not been for their exertions, would have remained in the hands of bankers and solicitors, who had no interest in seeing the creditors paid, and who, therefore, would still have retained the money in their hands; but who, through the well-directed and zealous labours of the new officers and the new system, have been compelled to render up those funds, and make dividends to many creditors who would otherwise have remained to this hour without receiving a shilling. There are even instances of old commissions being superseded, by reason of there being dividends recovered and distributed, to the amount of 20*s.* in the pound. This is the only observation I think it necessary to add to the lengthened remarks with which I have already trespassed upon your Lordships' attention.

The LORD CHANCELLOR.—I agree with much of what has fallen from my Noble and Learned Friend upon this important question. I agree that it would be highly expedient, if practicable, to establish an appellate jurisdiction very different from that which is, at present, in existence. I also think it would be highly advantageous that the head of the Court of Chancery should exclusively direct his attention to the business of that court. It will be in the recollection of the House that, in the year 1836, I submitted to your Lordships a Bill, the object of which was to introduce a system of Chancery reform; and it will be also recollected that extreme difficulty was experienced in the attempt to separate the appellate jurisdiction from this House. I was, therefore, compelled to abandon that plan, and so to modify my Bill as to render it acceptable to your Lordships. It was my opinion that it would be highly desirable that a permanent judge should be appointed, who, holding the great seal, should preside over the proceedings of this House, and over the appellate jurisdiction of the Privy Council; but, unfortunately, as I think, that suggestion was not adopted; and though my Noble and Learned Friend entertains a different opinion, nevertheless I still must be allowed to say that it would afford me great satisfaction if a change of that nature could be effected. With respect to appeals, I think it necessary to observe that, on the last day of term, it is my practice to look at the number of appeals; and, as a general rule,—admitting of hardly any exceptions,—to proceed, in the sittings after term, with the hearing of original causes. I am enabled, from the present state of the business in the Court of Chancery, to say that there has not been, recently, any increase of appeals, nor is there any probability of their getting ahead. The pressure of business, however, renders it necessary for the Vice Chancellor to take none but short causes; every cause of length, every cause likely to lead to protracted argument, is left in the list; all the short causes are taken out, the long causes being left in the list, precisely because they are long causes, and because they are difficult. My Lords, this course does not tend much to encourage me to deal with original causes. I trust I need hardly assure your Lordships, that when Parliament is not sitting, I give all the time which I possibly can to the business of the Court of Chancery; but I frankly acknowledge that I do not find myself able to accomplish anything considerable, as compared with the amount of arrears which exists; for it would be impossible for me, in less than three years, to dispose of the causes at this moment before the court: if I had nothing else to do, it would take me three years to get through them. In the year 1836, I stated my view of the whole question. I expressed my conviction that an increase of judicial strength was required, in order to grapple with the old arrears, and to prevent the accumulation of new ones. I have always done my utmost, so far as depended on the exertions of myself, individually; but I am able to effect, comparatively, nothing. Your Lordships may rest assured, if you will credit my experience, that justice cannot be as fully and as promptly administered under the present system as it ought to be, and that it is necessary to add to the judicial strength of the court. I should gladly accept anything as a palliative; I should not object to a proposition, merely because I might not think it sufficient; I should be glad to have it, if it would do something, though much more might really be required.

In listening to what I have heard this evening, it occasioned me some surprise to find that an attack was, indirectly, made on the Government by means of an attack upon myself. I have been accused of being slow in bringing forward measures of Chancery reform. If my Noble and Learned Friend reflects, he must, on a recollection of the circumstances, feel that this accusation is not fair. My Noble and Learned Friend must have reason to know that I contemplated bringing forward any measure of this sort which there might be the least probability of carrying. I wished and intended to bring forward a measure of reform, — not because I thought I could carry such a one as I wished, but because I thought it was my duty to accept whatever I could get. These certainly were my desires and intentions before the present Session commenced. When I brought forward my Bill in 1836, it was said that I had lost every thing by seeking to do too much. Others, again, affirmed that my ill success arose from asking too little. Be that, however, as it may, I will take upon myself to say that the remedy proposed by the Noble and Learned Lord goes to only a small part of that which the necessity of the case requires; but I acknowledge that it is directed against the precise portion of the evil which most urgently demands a remedy. The property involved in causes before the Court of Chancery is varied and enormous. The new mode of communication by railroads, for instance, recently introduced into this country, has added, in an inconceivable degree, to the business of that court. During the recess of last year, when I intended to go down to the country for a short period, I was obliged to stay in town for the purpose of deciding contests connected with these very subjects. But that is only one of many modes of investment giving rise to an increase of business. Every new scheme, connected in any way with property, immediately comes before the Court of Chancery, in some shape or other. The Noble and Learned Lord (Lord Lyndhurst) has alluded to the state of business in the time of Lord Hardwicke, who gave up the great seal in 1756. In five years from that period, the average number of causes was 401; whereas they averaged, between the years 1831 and 1835, no less than 1283. In comparing the average number of petitions at those respective dates, I find that in the former it was 871, and in the latter 1300. The average number of appeals brought before Lord Hardwicke in each year was 12; whilst, between the years 1831 and 1835, it was 55. The amount of money in the Court of Chancery, in the year 1812, was 28,370,000*l.*; and the number of causes, 6256. In the present year, the amount of money is 40,600,000*l.*; and the number of causes, 10,914. From your Lordships' Report in 1828, it was manifestly impossible that any person holding the great seal could get through the business of the Court of Chancery, and at the same time attend to that of your Lordships' House. If that was the case in 1828, your Lordships will see, from a comparison of the state of business between that period and the present, that the impossibility is rendered much more striking. I well remember that my Noble and Learned Friend used to commence business at ten o'clock in the morning, and conclude at twelve or one o'clock at night. My Noble and Learned Friend, — and I, myself, — might be able to bear the fatigue of such continued labour; but that is not the question. The question is, whether such a pressure is advantageous to the suitors, or best for their interests? In my opinion, it is not. In my opinion, it would be unworthy of the country to ask for or expect such a degree of application; but it does not. I conceive that no judge can satisfactorily perform his duty, who does not take a large portion of time, out of court, to investigate, and consider, and consult authorities, and make up his mind upon what he has heard in court. When upon their decision it depends whether property shall pass from the right owner to the wrong, or remain where it is, — when by their decision many families may be reduced from happiness to misery, — it behoves them to use all the means, and all the best means, within their power, in order to come to a right decision. This is the consideration which ought to operate upon every judicial mind. But how is it possible that that can be done if they hurry through their business? Consistently with this principle and with this object, the Court of Chancery is, at the present moment, totally incapable of discharging its functions; and yet the judges of that court are not idle. In communicating with the Vice Chancellor this morning, I found that he had commenced his labours for the day at four o'clock in the morning, — the very hour at which I concluded my labours — of the previous day; so that the Court of Chancery, it may be said, is up all night. The public, I am sure, do not require more than that; and if they do, it will be impossible to give them more. I hope my Noble and Learned Friend will concur with me in the necessity of going still further than he proposes to go, notwithstanding what has been said by my Noble and Learned Friend (Lord Brougham). It is quite obvious that the reform proposed by my Noble Friend must take place; but the very step which I suggest would lead to still further changes.

LORD LYNDHURST. — I don't mean to say that what I propose should be final. My doctrine is "not" that of "finality."

The LORD CHANCELLOR. — I am glad to hear my Noble and Learned Friend say so. But then, my Noble and Learned Friend — whose plan is only half a plan — not even half a plan — does not seem to have the necessary intention of meeting the evil, entirely. Between the years 1813 and 1821, the Lord Chancellor heard nothing but appeals. At present he is not able to get through the appeals from two judges; yet the proposition is, that he should get through the appeals from four judges! It is suggested that there should be an equity judge for original causes. There is not business for an equity judge. You may take away the equity cases from the Court of Exchequer, and appoint another judge in the Court of Chancery, who would dispose of those cases, and be also able to devote much time to the business of the Court of Chancery. But the first duty to be discharged, upon any change being made, will be to get rid of the arrears of the Court of Chancery. So soon as the means are found of having the business of that court done, then will its business be increased. When the Vice Chancellor's Court was created, in 1813, such was the immediate result. The average number of cases for the first three years was 540; and for the three following, 717. Under all these circumstances, it is evident that the public would derive very great benefit from some such a change as is proposed; and although it is far short of what they have a right to expect, I willingly consent to it.

LORD LANGDALE. — I certainly feel the highest satisfaction at the course which has been taken on the present occasion,—characterised as it has been, by an entire absence of party feeling, and by a concurrent desire to do that which will be most beneficial to the country. To say that the particular suggestion of my Noble and Learned Friend opposite is perfectly satisfactory, would be absurd. I could not say so. I feel with him, however, notwithstanding what has fallen from the Noble and Learned Lord (Lord Brougham) who has left the House, — and I believe that all those who have dispassionately given their attention to the subject elsewhere, likewise feel — that the arrears of the Court of Chancery constitute an enormous and intolerable grievance, as was observed by my Noble and Learned Friend opposite, which ought to be got rid of as soon as possible. I believe my Noble and Learned Friend has understated the case, notwithstanding the clear and very forcible manner in which he brought it forward. The great grievance is that of delay, to parties who are prepared; and the remedy proposed is, an increase of judicial strength. But the remedy, as applied by my Noble and Learned Friend, might lead, as he himself has admitted, to subsequent inconvenience. My Noble and Learned Friend said that perhaps it might turn out that the increased number of arrears could not be heard; and that, if it should so turn out, he would be willing to remedy that evil. I wish my Noble and Learned Friend would go farther, and prevent the evil while he foresees the probability of it. In my opinion, we ought to separate the judicial from the political functions of the Lord Chancellor altogether. It is impossible he can perform both efficiently. I also think that your Lordships cannot have a perfect remedy for all the grievances at present existing in the Court of Chancery, unless you have a constantly sitting court of appeal in this House, independent of the judges of the Court of Chancery. As to the appointment of another equity judge to the Court of Exchequer, I doubt whether, under the present constitution of that court, there would be business for another judge. If the equity jurisdiction of that court were abolished, and all the equity causes now subsisting in it were transferred to the Court of Chancery, then would there be ample employment for another judge in that court. The Noble and Learned Lord opposite (Lord Lyndhurst) having consented to the appointment of two new equity judges, the only question appears to be, how their services might be most effectively made use of. The Noble and Learned Lord proposes that one of the new judges should sit in the Court of Exchequer. That, however, does not appear to me to be the most advisable course to adopt. It is said that it would have the advantage of giving only one appeal from the decision of the new judge; but what are called appeals before the Lord Chancellor, are not, properly speaking, appeals, but re-hearings, which differ in many respects from appeals. These re-hearings I consider to be very beneficial, as they are often the first occasions upon which cases are fully understood and argued. At the original hearing, points are frequently raised in such a manner as to be a surprise upon one of the parties; and, in fact, a party hardly understands his own case until he discovers what his adversary's is. Now, in the Court of the Exchequer, as it exists at present, the re-hearing must take place before the same judge who heard the cause originally; which certainly appears not to be so advantageous a course as that which prevails in the Court of Chancery. If, therefore, it were determined that one of the new judges should sit in the Court of Exchequer, it would be desirable to provide a means for allowing the causes, which might came on before him, to be re-heard before the Lord Chancellor; and that arrangement would have the additional advantage of securing uniformity of decision.

LORD LYNDHURST. — My object is to render the equity side of the Exchequer an effective court. I fear that the proposition to appoint two new judges in Chancery would meet with difficulties elsewhere. Perhaps it would be best to try, in the first place, what would be the effect of creating one new judge.

VISCOUNT MELVILLE. — At this late hour, it is not my intention to detain your Lordships longer than for a moment. It appears to me that one great grievance is, the interval that frequently elapses between the hearing of appeals and the delivery of judgment. I know the time of the Noble and Learned Lord on the woolsack is pretty well occupied with attending in this House, and performing his duties elsewhere; but I do trust that my Noble Friend will direct his attention to this subject.

The LORD CHANCELLOR. — I have lately paid much attention to the subject; and after Wednesday next, the last day of Term, I have no doubt that I shall begin clearing off the arrears.

The motion was then agreed to.

PRIVATE BUSINESS.

The following petitions were severally presented; namely, —

Deptford Pier Junction Railway Bill, — Against, — from inhabitants of St. Nicholas, Deptford; and inhabitants and parishioners of St. Nicholas, Deptford, and owners of property and others.

Black Quarry (or Anniesland) Road Bill. — Petition of trustees of the Glasgow and Garscube Bridge Road, against.

Referred to the committees on the Bills; counsel ordered.

Birmingham Canal Bill, — Of the company of proprietors of the Warwick and Birmingham Canal, praying that the Select Committee on Petitions for Private Bills may have leave to sit and proceed on the petition for additional provision upon Monday next, or that the further consideration of the Report of the Bill may be postponed.

Norwich Improvement Bill. — Petition of Sir William Foster, Baronet, praying that the petitioners against the Bill, whose petition was presented on the 28th day of May last, being the first day on which it could be presented after the Whitsuntide recess, may be permitted to be heard before the committee on the Bill, notwithstanding the said petition was not presented three days clear before the meeting of the committee.

To lie on the table, and to be printed.

Redcar Harbour (No. 2.) Bill. — Petition of merchants, shipowners, and others of Stockton, against. — To lie on the table.

Kingston upon Hull Docks. — Petition of William Vizard, Esquire, praying that the compliance with the Standing Orders may not, in this case, be dispensed with.

Birmingham Canal Bill. — Petition of proprietors of the Birmingham Canal navigations, praying to be heard against the petition for additional provision.

Referred to the Select Committee on Petitions for Private Bills.

The following Bills were read a second time, and committed as follows: —

Blunt's Estate Bill, — To SIR CHARLES BURRELL and the West Sussex list.

Harrow School Estate Bill, — To MAJOR WOOD and the Middlesex list.

Almsworthy (Somerset) Inclosure Bill; Liverpool Churches Bill. — Read a third time, and passed.

Fraserburgh Harbour Bill. — Read a third time; amendments made; Bill passed.

Nottingham (St. Mary's) Inclosure Bill; Moy Navigation Bill. — Reported; Reports to lie on the table.

Sawmill Ford Bridge and Road Bill. — Report further considered (prints having been delivered on Friday, 31st of May); amendments agreed to; Bill to be ingrossed.

Newport Dock. — Report (31st of May) from the Select Committee on Standing Orders read; Bill ordered to be brought in by LORD GRANVILLE SOMERSET and Mr. ADDAMS WILLIAMS.

Liverpool and Manchester Railway (Extension) Bill; Great North of England Railway Bill. — Lords' amendments agreed to.

Hodson's Estate Bill. — Read a first time; to be read a second time.

Newark Small Debts Bill. — Committee revived; leave to sit and proceed on Tuesday next.

Norwich Improvement Bill. — Time enlarged for committee to report till Monday, 17th of June.

CHELTENHAM IMPROVEMENT BILL.

GENERAL LYGON. — In moving that this Bill be now read a third time, I shall trouble the House with but one observation. The chief objection urged against the measure is, that it will disfranchise the great body of ratepayers. Now, the House will see, on referring to the Bill itself, that it contains no provision of that nature.

Mr. C. BERKELEY. — I will not detain the House by repeating the arguments which I used against this Bill on Tuesday last. In consequence, however, of the observation made by my Honourable and Gallant Friend, — that it will not disfranchise the ratepayers, — I must distinctly state that such will necessarily be the effect of the Bill. It only acknowledges the landlords, and not the tenants, in the character of ratepayers; and will, unquestionably, disfranchise more than one half of the present ratepayers. There is another great monstrosity, if I may call it so, in this Bill. It empowers the commissioners to sit with closed doors, and to levy more than 4000*l.* a-year from the ratepayers without responsibility. I can compare such commissioners to nothing better than a select vestry of the worst possible description. I therefore move, as an amendment, that the Bill be read a third time this day six months.

Mr. G. BERKELEY. — I second the amendment.

SIR C. LEMON. — To refuse to pass this Bill will, in my mind, be a great injustice. I am quite unconnected with the Bill, further than having carefully examined its 260 clauses. Two petitions were presented against the Bill, — one from a gentleman who wished to except part of his property from its operations, and the other containing the allegations on which the attempt is now made to quash the Bill altogether. The latter petition was not supported, because, as was stated the other evening, the parties did not choose to incur the expense of employing counsel. Surely, if the measure were likely to be attended with such injurious consequences to the town of Cheltenham as have been predicted, the parties concerned would not have hesitated to incur so small an expense as the feeing of counsel. They might have appeared by their own attorney; or it was open to my Honourable Friend the Member for Cheltenham, himself, to have supported that petition in the committee. The whole question was referred to a committee; the House has already given a decision upon it; and will it now turn round, and disavow its own acts?

The truth is, that the entire ground for pursuing such a course is to be seen in the objection which certain gentlemen entertain to the principle of plural voting. Now I think it will be an act of gross injustice to throw out the Bill at its last stage, and after the great expense which has been incurred by its promoters, upon such an objection.

Mr. COURTENAY. — I am also totally unconnected with the parties interested in this Bill. I came, however, to the determination to support it in consequence of an advertisement (for it is little else), which I this day saw in a leading Radical newspaper, and which I look upon as an attempt to convert this House into an arena of party politics on the discussion of a Private Bill. It was in consequence of the disgraceful manner in which Private Bills were conducted, — in consequence of gentlemen coming down to committees on those Bills, totally ignorant of the evidence which had been given upon them, and voting, not according to the merits of the case, of which they knew nothing, but in accordance with the request of one of the parties to them, — that the Right Honourable Gentleman who now fills the chair introduced a plan of reform which, I am happy to say, has hitherto operated as a check upon such improper practices. Here, however, is an attempt to renew them, and in a still worse shape. The whole merits of the case having been investigated before a committee, and decided upon by the House, this Bill is allowed to proceed to a third reading, when an advertisement appears in a newspaper, calling upon Honourable Members of a certain party to come down and nullify the result of that committee and the decision of the House. I conceive, therefore, that the character of the House is at stake upon the question. I know nothing of the case —— — except from reading the statements on both sides; and I must say that, independently of the weight which the House ought to attach to the decision of the committee, all the weight of testimony is in favour of the Bill. Petitions have been presented from 351 ratepayers against it, and from 543 in its favour. Upon these grounds I support the third reading of the Bill.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

[Cries of "Divide!"]

COLONEL SEALE. — I oppose the Bill on the ground stated by the Honourable Member for Cheltenham, — that it will disfranchise a great number of the ratepayers.

[Cheers and confusion.]

Mr. CLAY.— Let the House throw out the Bill, if it pleases; but let it not do so on a complete misapprehension of the facts. Now, I assert that this Bill does not disfranchise the ratepayers. Every man paying his rates will be entitled to vote. The principle of rating in this Bill is similar to that in almost all the metropolitan parochial Bills. The Honourable and Gallant Member has said that the commissioners can vote with closed doors. It is not imperative on them to do so.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

Is there any one body of commissioners created throughout the kingdom to whom such a discretionary power is not given? Is there a sessions of the peace in which the magistrates have not the power to admit or refuse admission to reporters? I must say that I do not think the House is acting wisely in making a Private Bill the subject of a party struggle; and I felt that I could not allow my Honourable Friends on this side of the House to go to a division under such circumstances, in perfect misapprehension of the facts. I contend that the ratepayers are in favour of this Bill; that it is imperatively required for the town of Cheltenham; that the principle on which it is brought forward is that, upon which similar Bills have been granted to Brighton, to Ramsgate, and a variety of other towns; and that, after the expense which has been incurred by the promoters of the Bill, the House will be guilty of a gross injustice in throwing it out.

[Cries of "Hear!" and, "Divide!"]

An HONOURABLE MEMBER.—I see a clause in this Bill by which the owners, but none by which the occupiers, of houses of the value of 10*l.* are to pay the rates?

LORD GRANVILLE SOMERSET. — If the Honourable Member had taken the trouble to read the Bill, he would have found that, by the 107th clause, it is provided that any person wishing to be assessed may be so.

[Cries of "Divide!"]

The House divided, on the motion, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question:"—Ayes 177; Noes 186; — Majority 9.

ATHLONE BRIDGE.

Mr. J. O'CONNELL. — I wish to know whether the Government intend to propose the erection of a new bridge at Athlone? and if so, whether it is to be proposed in a clause in the Bill for improving the navigation of the Shannon, or in a separate measure?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — It is the intention of the Government to take the same course with respect to the bridge at Athlone as they did last year, and to propose its erection in one of the clauses in the Bill referred to by the Honourable Member.

FOREIGN LOTTERIES.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — I wish to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether the Government intend taking any steps with respect to foreign lotteries? They are constantly advertised in the newspapers of this country; and letters are even sent from abroad respecting them, much to the inconvenience of the public. The practice is, in my opinion, an evasion of the law.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Two years ago the Government introduced a Bill to do away with the practice; but, finding that the measure could not be carried out, it was abandoned. I am quite ready to amend the present law, if it be possible; but there are so many means of evading any law on the subject, that to do so will be attended with great difficulty. It shall not, however, be overlooked by the Government, who have already paid much attention to the subject.

IMPROVEMENT IN THE METROPOLIS.

Mr. HERRIES. — I beg to know whether any steps will be taken by the Government to carry into effect the recommendations of the committee who sat on the subject of improvements in the metropolis?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — The Report of the committee has been submitted to the Commissioners of the Woods and Forests; and I am happy to say that there is every readiness on their part to act on the recommendations which it contains.

IRELAND.

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — I wish to ask a question of the Noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland. The Noble Lord is aware that, on the 4th of May last, the magistrates of the county of Sligo assembled together on a summons from the Lord Lieutenant, and came to a unanimous resolution, That several of the murders and assaults recently committed in that country had been committed with sticks loaded with lead or iron; and that the habit of carrying sticks loaded in this destructive manner was becoming common in Ireland. They, therefore, called the attention of the Lord Lieutenant to the necessity for re-enacting the provisions of the 11 George II. cap. 10., which prohibits the carrying of sticks loaded in this manner, and subjects the persons carrying them to punishment. I wish to be informed whether it is the intention of her Majesty's Government to introduce any legislative enactment, in conformity with this recommendation of a meeting which was composed of men of all parties?

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — I have directed the attention of the law officers of the Crown to the subject, and I hope, soon, to receive their Report, and to embody its substance in a Bill.

PRISONS BILL.

On the Order of the Day for the further consideration of the Report on this Bill being read, —

Mr. WAKLEY said: — Sir, I propose, as an additional rule to the fifth clause of this Bill, — "That the surgeons of prisons shall keep a daily journal, written in English, of the medicine, diet, and other treatment of sick prisoners." I trust, the utility of this rule being so obvious, that no Member will oppose its introduction.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I do not see any objection to the insertion of those words.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL. — I confess I have my doubts as to the expediency of this rule. I am afraid it will cause a great deal of unnecessary trouble.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I do not recognise the force of the objection urged by the Right Honourable Baronet opposite. In cases of death in gaol, it is, of course, absolutely necessary that the cause should be minutely inquired into; and, on such principle, no inquiries could be more natural than those respecting the treatment administered during illness. According to the present system, there is merely a memorandum kept of the number of persons attended by the surgeon, but no particulars.

Mr. SANFORD. — I do not think the adoption of this rule will cause any very serious additional trouble. On the other hand, it will be very satisfactory to the surgeon to have a record of the cases he has attended.

LORD VISCOUNT DUNGANNON. — I cannot but think that this alteration is desirable on many grounds. For instance, the surgeon may be incompetent, and there is no way of ascertaining the fact so sure as a record of his mode of treatment.

Mr. WAKLEY. — I would enter more at length into this discussion, were it not that I might be accused of attacking a branch of a profession to which I at one time belonged. My object is no other, than to improve the mode of proceeding in gaols.

The rule was then agreed to, and incorporated.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — I wish to have a rule inserted, permitting prisoners to be visited by their friends and professional advisers.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I regret, very much, that I have not any rule of this kind prepared; but I shall take care to introduce it on the third reading.

Amendments agreed to, with an amendment; Bill to be read a third time on Monday, the 17th of June.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I move that the House do now adjourn until half past eight o'clock.

House adjourned accordingly.

JAMAICA GOVERNMENT BILL.

On the motion of Mr. LABOUCHERE, —Order for second reading, read; Bill to be now read a second time; House informed that counsel were in attendance; counsel called in; Bill read a second time; petition of Mr. Burge (presented the 3d of June) read.

Mr. BURGE was then summoned to the bar, and addressed the House to the folfowing effect: —

Sir, I appear at this bar, as the agent for Jamaica, against the Bill now before the House. I appear here, because the people of Jamaica are unrepresented in this House, and have no means by which they can assert their rights and implore the protection of the House against the violation of their rights, except by means of the weak advocacy of the individual who has now the honour of addressing you. I have no distrust of the anxious desire of this House to afford ample justice, and to extend adequate protection, to the people of Jamaica, upon this, as I am confident was the case on a former, occasion. I have no fear but that, when this House is called to legislate touching — or rather to make most serious innovations on — the established constitution of a distant colony, it will give the subject that consideration which is essential for the purpose of enabling it to do the desired justice. I am the more disposed to entertain this belief, because it is impossible to look at the Bill proposed to be introduced, without plainly perceiving that that degree of information on the subject is not possessed, which it is meet there should be, by those who have the superintendence and administration of colonial affairs. Sir, I am most anxious to abstain from every topic which is not absolutely essential to the just consideration of the merits of this measure, or which has been rendered unnecessary by the discussion which took place on a former occasion. It is not necessary for me to inform the House that the people of Jamaica are British subjects, who, from the first settlement, have had a constitution based on the law and principles of the British constitution. This House has now decided that that constitution shall be preserved inviolate. The most valuable part of that constitution, to which the people of Jamaica look for the protection of themselves and of their property, is the popular branch of it — the House of Assembly. This House, by the decision which it has given, has not only recognised the existence of the House of Assembly, but has preserved it. I need not defend the House of Assembly against those allegations contained in the preamble of a former Bill, which were supposed to constitute a charge furnishing a ground upon which the constitution might be suspended, and the functions of the Assembly transferred to another body; because the House has decided that, be the conduct of the Assembly what it might, it was not that which would justify the suspension of the constitution, and the transferring of the functions of the Assembly to another body. The legitimate and necessary inference, also, from the abandonment of the former Bill is, that the House has decided that the constitution of Jamaica should be preserved in reality, and not in name; and that the Assembly in substance, and not in shadow, should be upheld. Sir, this House will never consent to leave the people of Jamaica in possession of a constitution and of a House of Assembly, and yet adopt a measure which shall, in fact, so maim that constitution as to destroy the independence of the popular branch of the Legislature. Yet such is the effect of the Bill which is now before the House. The Bill is a fraud upon the decision which the House came to before, and upon the principle which influenced the House in that decision. The Government have had the opportunity of knowing that, by adopting a course of conciliation, such a measure as the present one would be needless. They have had the opinions of a large majority of the persons deeply interested in the welfare of Jamaica, to that effect; for, shortly after the announcement of the abandonment of the former Bill, a meeting of the Jamaica proprietors was held, which came to certain resolutions expressive of the sentiments it entertained. That meeting was presided over by the Earl of Harewood, and it was unanimously resolved, That the meeting disapproved of the late Bill, because it would have excited the distrust of the emancipated population towards the other classes, and because it was an infringement on the rights of the people. It would also have endangered the successful issue of the great measure of emancipation. These resolutions were communicated to her Majesty's Ministers by the Noble Earl who presided at the meeting, and who attended the deputation. That Noble Earl strongly urged the principle of conciliation: he went further; he told her Majesty's Ministers that these were sentiments, entertained not only by the great body of the proprietors] here, but they had also been ascertained to be the opinions of the proprietors in Jamaica. He strongly urged a course of conciliation, which the Executive itself might have initiated by means of communication with the Governor, and through him to the Assembly. The sentiments expressed on that occasion have been repeated since the Bill was introduced; and the sentiment of the great majority of the proprietors still remains unchanged,—that the true and wise policy is that of conciliation. If the Government had adopted that course, no one could have condemned them for acting in accordance with the recommendations and suggestions of the great body of proprietors. It would also have protected the Government from the imputation of having given up the Bill because the House would not give its sanction to the suspension of the Assembly.

Sir, the Bill now before the House is calculated to bring on a crisis, by driving the House of Assembly to desperation,—a crisis, which would enable her Majesty's Ministers to come to this House, and say that the Assembly had refused to accede to the wishes of the Imperial Legislature. Every consideration as regards her Majesty's Ministers, and every consideration as regards the welfare of the colonies, would have suggested that the course to be pursued for the advantage of the colony, was—not the introduction of this Bill, but a communication of conciliation to be made by the Governor to the House of Assembly. Sir, by the clauses of this Bill, if the Assembly shall pass a measure to which the council shall object, it will be laid on the table of the council for a certain time; and if it do not pass into a law on the 20th of October, the Governor and council can pass a law on the subject. In the same way, if an amendment be made by the council, to a Bill passed by the Assembly, to which amendment the House of Assembly shall not assent, and if it shall remain till the 30th of October, the Governor may pass a law on the subject. But even if the Assembly and the council should agree on a Bill, the Governor may object to it, unless it contain certain provisions. Thus it is proposed that the Governor, or rather the Colonial Department, shall absorb the whole legislative power of the colony, of which no more than the mere shadow is left to the representative body of Jamaica. Again, in the revival or re-enactment of laws which expired in October, 1838. The majority of those Acts are for the imposition of annual taxes: now, if the Assembly should not think proper to renew any of these, or should think that taxes of a different kind are more advisable, yet the fact of their not renewing them by the 30th of October next, will give to the Governor in council the power of renewing them, though some of them may be not only for the imposition of taxes, but also for their appropriation. Thus the entire colony might become vested in the Governor in council, or in the Colonial Department at home, by which he is instructed. I beg the House to remark how carefully there is retained, in the present Bill, everything in the former measure which could tend to degrade the white population of Jamaica,—to the disparagement of the House of Assembly and of the characters of the individuals of whom it was composed, subject, as they would be, to the infliction of this despotic law, and called on to exercise certain functions under the coercion of a most humiliating menace. This Bill has plainly the effect of utterly subverting the independency of the Assembly. Sir, the Government cannot, in justice, make the non-session of the Assembly the ground of this measure, for that is the consequence of their own proceeding. A prejudice has been endeavoured to be created against the planters of Jamaica, on the ground that they are desirous of retaining the Vagrant Act of Charles II., and of availing themselves of its severe enactments, in order to oppress the negro. All I can say is, that that Act is considered in Jamaica as an obsolete Act; and during the whole course of my fourteen years' experience as Attorney General of the island, not one conviction, or even prosecution, ever took place under that Act. Then, as to there being any necessity for the Orders in Council, the proprietors of Jamaica, for whose benefit they are proposed to be passed, do not ask for, nor do they require them; but, on the contrary, they consider such an interference to be a violation of their constitutional privileges. The colonists know well that nothing but ruin can result from placing the Assembly in such a position; that in it, it would be impossible for it to exercise its legislative functions, nor could it command either the respect or the confidence of the various classes of the inhabitants of the island. There are several subjects on which the House of Assembly are ready to legislate—subjects on which it is their interest they should legislate; but it is not their interest to do so under circumstances that would render their legislation useless and degrading. It is impossible that any body of men would undertake the business of legislation, restricted in the exercise of their free opinions. I submit that I have established, by a revision of different Acts, that if the Imperial Parliament interfere at all, it should only interfere under circumstances of paramount necessity, and that the framers of this Bill have failed in establishing any such necessity. The colonists deprecate the passing of this law; and I cannot help thinking, when the House considers that the West India proprietors, also, in this country, call on them to forbear, that they will have no excuse in proceeding with a measure which must tend to shake all confidence in the colony, cause the greatest difference of opinion, destroy all good feeling and every good disposition, and entirely annihilate that close relationship which ought ever to exist between a colony and its mother country.

Mr. BURGE then withdrew.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — In moving that the Bill be committed for Monday next, I wish to observe, that in the printing of the Bill a material omission has been made in the second clause, which has rendered the intention of it very obscure. When I last addressed the House upon this subject, I stated that it would be the object of the Government to give ample opportunity to the House of Assembly to legislate on all those subjects suggested by the Imperial Parliament. The words which have been omitted, are after the word council, in the second line, "from and after the first day of October, 1839." These words should have been introduced, and are, in fact, necessary to render the intention of the Government clear. I have thought it right to the counsel who has just addressed the House, as well as my duty to the House, to explain this omission, in order to prevent any mistake as to our intentions. I now move that this Bill be committed for Monday next.

Upon the question being put, —

SIR E. SUGDEN said: — I think the words which the Right Honourable Gentleman proposes to introduce will not be found to accord with the rest of the sentence. But my object, in rising, is — to state the course which I intend to pursue when this Bill is in committee. I propose to move to omit the first clause altogether; and, with respect to the second clause, to move that the powers which it confers shall be given to the Governor and council, only in case the Assembly shall have neglected, up to a certain day, — to be named afterwards, — to continue or re-enact those laws to which it refers. It appears, however, that, with respect to this second clause, we are now agreed: my motion, therefore, will be, that the first section of the Bill be omitted.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I do not know whether I correctly understand the Right Honourable Gentleman; but I collect from what he has said, that he does not mean to take the sense of the House against going into committee on the Bill.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — Hear, hear!

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Then, I understand the Right Honourable Gentleman intends to take the sense of the House against the first clause, which is the clause giving the Governor and council power to enact new laws? The Right Honourable Gentleman proposes to retain the second clause, giving the Governor and council power to re-enact and continue expired laws, but giving it only in the event of the Assembly having neglected to legislate by a certain day.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — The Noble Lord has exactly stated what the object of my motion is.

The motion was then agreed to; Bill committed for Monday next.

WATERFORD FEVER HOSPITAL BILL.

Order for further consideration of Report read; Bill recommitted; instruction to the committee, that they have power to make provision enabling the Grand Jury of the county of Waterford to present money, and repay the county of the city of Waterford certain sums expended in relieving the sick of the county of Waterford, in said hospital; Bill considered in committee, and reported; further consideration of Report on Monday next; Bill, as amended, to be printed.

BANKRUPTS (IRELAND) BILL. — REGISTERS OF BIRTHS, &c. BILL.

Further consideration of Reports deferred till Monday next.

DOUBLE AND TREBLE COSTS BILL.

Reported; to be read a third time on Monday next.

FRESH FRUIT TRADE.

Mr. HODGES. — I rise to move, That a select committee be appointed to inquire into the state of the fresh fruit trade.

Mr. POULETT THOMSON. — I do not intend to oppose the motion, because I understand that there is a very general and very strong desire, on the part of the fruit growers in Kent and Sussex, to have an inquiry into the state of the law relating to the importation of fruit as it at present stands. To that I can have no objection. As to the article, apples,—the introduction of which I believe is more particularly objected to as interfering with the profits of our own growers,—I must observe, that if the House or the committee should determine that foreign apples shall not be admitted at the moderate duty of 5 per cent., I shall at once abandon all hope of the continuance of those commercial advantages with neighbouring countries which we have of late years enjoyed. I was one of those who supported Mr. Canning and Mr. Huskisson in their views of commercial policy. I am sorry, however, to say, that since I have had the honour to hold office, I have received no support, except from the Right Honourable Baronet the leader of the other side of the House, in my endeavours to carry out those principles of commercial policy so introduced by them.

Now, let us see what is actually the injury which the apple grower has received by the reduction of the duty on the importation of foreign apples — for that, of course, will be one of the first points upon which the committee will receive evidence. Upon inquiry, the House will find that the price of apples, last autumn, after the reduction of duty which took place last summer, was nearly twice as high as it had been in the autumn of the previous year; therefore no injury can have resulted to the grower. But it may be apprehended that injury will be sustained by the British fruit grower, if the present system of low import duties continue. I am quite satisfied that those apprehensions are in a very great degree delusive; because, in a good apple year, when we have a plentiful crop in this country, the price of apples will be so low, that there would be a loss on the importation of foreign apples; it is only in a bad apple year that you can afford to import the fruit from abroad; and I think I may safely say that the price of apples is now as high as it would be, if no importation were allowed. But I conceive that we have a right to claim, on the part of the community, that when there is a scarcity, the people should have all the advantages which it is in the power of the Government to give them to enable them to obviate that difficulty. I hold in my hand a statement which I have received from one of the most important growers in the country, and one of the most deeply interested of those who have petitioned for an alteration of the duty. I asked him to give me an account of the price of apples before the reduction of the duty, and of the price last year; and this is his statement: — In October, 1833, the price of apples was 2*s.* 2*d.* per bushel; in 1834, 3*s.*; in 1835, 2*s.* 4*d.*; in 1836, 3*s.* 6*d.*; in 1837, 1*s.* 9*d.*; and in October, 1838, after the reduction of the duty, 4*s.* 6*d.* I think, then, it would be somewhat difficult to show that any loss has been sustained in consequence of the alteration in question. The operation of the change of duty is just this, — owing to the perishable nature of this article, — that, in bad years, you get the article when you want it, and in good years it will not pay you to import it, — the cost of importation being about 2*s.* a-bushel in addition to the original cost of the apples. I have no objection to the appointment of the proposed committee; but what I wish is, that the inquiry should be extended — so as to embrace the whole question — into Mr. Huskisson's alteration, as well as mine. Of this, however, I am quite satisfied, — that we have conferred advantages on the commercial interest which it had not, before, and that we have created a trade which did not previously exist. In agreeing to the motion for the inquiry, I have but this to add,—that whatever may be the opinion of the committee, it will take very much to convince me that, in a country like this, such an article as apples requires a protective duty of nearly 200 per cent.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL. — I will not follow the example set by the Right Honourable Gentleman, of saying anything which can be likely to prejudice the fair consideration of this question by a select committee. It is a question which materially affects the poorer classes, and particularly those in Kent and Sussex. It has also a very important bearing on the question of tithes. I shall not, however, say a word on its merits, as I have no doubt that a full and fair investigation will take place before the committee, when the House will be in a much better condition to give an opinion, than it can be at this time.

Digitized by Google

Mr. WALLACE.—It is only by the introduction of foreign apples that the poorer classes can, in all seasons, obtain their apple dumplings on Sundays. For my own part, I think we ought to allow the introduction, at moderate duties, of all articles that cannot be always produced in our own uncertain climate. And with this feeling I shall divide the House against the appointment of a select committee.

Mr. HERRIES.—The Right Honourable Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade has taunted Honourable Gentlemen on the Opposition side of the House with not having supported him in the liberal course of policy which he has pursued with regard to trade. There is certainly no good ground for that taunt; for never has any gentleman, at the head of a public department, been so little attacked, even when most open to attack, by an Opposition, as the Right Honourable Gentleman. He is allowed to bring forward Bills at the end of the Session, and to press them through the House, when those who are materially interested are absent and unable to offer opposition; and this, too, almost without complaint. The Right Honourable Gentleman has most unjustly accused us of having swerved from those principles which we advocated when they were brought forward by Mr. Canning and Mr. Huskisson. Now, however the Right Honourable Gentleman may have been deserted, in his attempts to carry out those principles, by Honourable Members near him, he has never heard one word of opposition from those who sit on this side of the House, and were in office at the time he speaks of. As regards the question under consideration, I shall not, at this time, express an opinion on its merits. Indeed, it would be premature in me to do so until the result of the investigation which is to take place is known. I cannot, however, help saying, that, considering the mode in which the Right Honourable Gentleman introduced the Customs Bill last Session, it will be quite impossible for him to refuse this committee. That Bill was introduced at so late a period, that no opportunity was afforded to those whose interests were materially affected by its provisions, to offer the measure any opposition. I think that the growers of Kent and Sussex, whose whole interests are wrapped up in this subject, ought to have some little attention paid to them by the Right Honourable Gentleman. Their feelings ought not to be wholly disregarded by the Minister of the Crown, in considering this matter; and I repeat, that never was there a case in which the Right Honourable Gentleman was more bound to grant an inquiry than in the one now before us.

Mr. MARK PHILIPS.—The Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down has complained of my Right Honourable Friend that he did not bring forward the Customs Bill until a late period of last Session; but I believe he has no power to bring in any measure involving alterations in the customs duties, until after the Chancellor of the Exchequer shall have brought forward his Budget. It is not my intention to join with the Honourable Member for Greenock in opposing this motion; and I trust that, in giving my cordial assent to the proposed inquiry in this case, I shall not stand worse with the House than those Honourable Gentlemen who successfully refused the proposition for a committee to inquire into the effect of the operation of the corn laws. I consider regularity of supply and moderate prices highly desirable to all classes; and, as to the article of fruit, those objects, from the uncertainty of this climate, cannot be attained, except by the introduction of foreign fruit.

Mr. GODSON.—I do not rise to express any opinion upon the merits of the question, but merely to assure the House that there are other counties as deeply interested in this matter as either Kent or Sussex.

Mr. DARBY.—The Honourable Member for Manchester (Mr. Mark Philips) has stated, as an excuse for delaying Bills that involve matters relating to the customs, that they cannot be brought in until the Budget has been submitted. Now, I do not think that this is a question which depends upon the Budget; but, if it be, that is only an argument why the Budget should be produced at an earlier period. It is the general opinion of all classes, that, if the Act of last Session be continued in force, the proprietors of orchards in Kent and Sussex will be ruined. And it has been said by one apple grower, who employed forty men every week during the last season, that, if the present low duties were to continue for any length of time, the orchards of this country would be destroyed. I think, then, this becomes a subject of very great importance to the poorer classes,—not to the extent of as to whether they shall have foreign apples for their puddings? but, whether a large portion of them shall be deprived of the means of supporting themselves and their families? I hope the House will accede to the motion for inquiry; but, whether it do or not, I shall in future feel it my duty, when any Customs Bill is brought forward at a late period of the Session, to examine it closely, and see that the protecting duties be not taken off without proper discussion.

Mr. HODGES. — In this case the protecting duty was removed without any petition having been presented, or any remonstrance or complaint being made against it.

The House then divided: — Ayes 26; Noes 14; — Majority 12.

FACTORIES REGULATION ACT.

LORD LYNDHURST. — I have to present a petition from three individuals, who describe themselves as cotton spinners of Glasgow, who were examined before a parliamentary committee, last year, with respect to factory labour. They declare that the statements they then made, from their own observations and knowledge, were as accurate as possible. They complain of an evasion of the factory laws, — state that the Report of Mr. Stuart is drawn up with great partiality, — and pray your Lordships to appoint a committee to inquire into the facts. I have also another petition to present on the same subject, which emanates from the inhabitants of Glasgow, assembled at a public meeting. The petitioners say that the evidence given before the committee of the other House of Parliament on the subject of factories, was correct, and that many of the statements contained in Mr. Stuart's Report are unfounded. They therefore pray that an inquiry may be instituted with respect to the truth of the facts stated in evidence, and also as to the correctness of the assertions contained in Mr. Stuart's Report. I merely move that the petitions be laid on the table. It is not my intention to move for the appointment of a committee, because I understand that similar petitions will be presented to the other House of Parliament, and it is not impossible that a committee will be appointed, there, to investigate the facts referred to.

Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

ROMAN CATHOLIC CHANCELLOR AND ECCLESIASTICAL JUDGES.

VISCOUNT STRANGFORD. — I am extremely anxious to put a question to the Noble Viscount opposite, on a subject which I conceive to be of great interest and importance to her Majesty's Protestant subjects. I perceive, from the printed "Votes" of the House of Commons, that an Honourable and Learned Member of that Assembly has given notice of his intention to bring in a Bill to enable persons professing the Popish faith to practise in the spiritual courts of these realms, and to hold the office of Lord High Chancellor. I could only know the circumstance through the channel to which I have alluded; but I have heard that the announcement was received with cheers by those to whose support the Noble Viscount is mainly indebted for his small majorities; and that no expression of disgust or indignation came from the colleagues of the Noble Viscount, — they being the Protestant servants of a Protestant Sovereign. I now wish to ask whether the measures, of which notice has been thus given, are to be brought forward with the concurrence and sanction of any portion of that section of which it is said the present Cabinet is partly composed? — whether the Government have given any countenance to such a proceeding?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — Certainly not. The subject was not introduced with the sanction or approbation of her Majesty's Government.

VISCOUNT STRANGFORD. — I am very glad of it.

LORD BROUGHAM. — Such a proposition seems to me to be almost as harmless as it is absurd.

MR. O'CONNELL.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — My Lords, I have to express my astonishment that certain statements which have been publicly made by an Honourable Member of the other House, and which have been reiterated by the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin, have not met with the reprehension they deserve from the Noble Viscount and his colleagues. They ought to have been the first to repel such base, unmanly, and wicked statements. Those speeches have, however, been suffered to pass unnoticed! No attempt has been made to check such proceedings! I believe, in truth, that Ministers cannot help themselves; and, that being the case, I can assimilate the authority that is exercised over them in no other manner, than by comparing it to that sort of control which Mr. Van Ambergh exercises over his lions.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — I rise to order. I put it to your Lordships whether it is not unusual and irregular to proceed with a discussion when there is no motion before the House?

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — I can meet the objection of the Noble Marquess by moving the Order of the Day; though I do not think, looking to the constant practice of the House, that I am out of order. When a question is asked with reference to certain proceedings of the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin, I certainly have a right to state my opinion as to the situation in which the Government is kept by that individual.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — It certainly is out of order, after a question has been put and answered, to proceed with a discussion.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — I will put it to the candour of the Noble Marquess, whether these things are not constantly done? Whether they are not done night after night, and week after week? I would ask, is not the Noble and Learned Lord opposite constantly doing the same thing?

LORD BROUGHAM. — Certainly, this course is often taken. The Noble Marquess is not, undoubtedly, the first to adopt the practice, though he often recurs to it. I admit that I have, myself, sometimes followed the example of the Noble Marquess. I wish to state, with regard to what has been said respecting the individual ——

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — The Noble and Learned Lord is now speaking, there being no question before the House. Surely, then, I have a right to take the same latitude.

LORD BROUGHAM. — Perhaps I shall be excused, in consequence of some correspondence which has taken place with me on this subject. It is not correct to say that the Honourable Member for Dublin used the same violent language as others at the meeting in question; on the contrary, he veiled his language much more than others who spoke there. It is also right to state, that the Honourable Gentleman to whom allusion has been made has denied having used certain very coarse expressions that have been imputed to him. I certainly feel that I ought to apologise to your Lordships for ever having entered into the matter at all; but I have deviated from my usual course, in consequence of the great respect which I owe to that illustrious family.

A NOBLE LORD. — To one individual.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I certainly speak of the "late" Mr. Grattan; and I am greatly astonished that such sentiments should have been attributed to a descendant of his.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — Does he say that he did not use the words imputed to him?

LORD BROUGHAM. — He declares that his expressions were not so strong as they have been represented.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — Can the Noble and Learned Lord defend the expressions of the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin?

LORD BROUGHAM. — Surely not. — Quite the contrary.

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY. — Then I will read what was said by the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin, from which the other Honourable Member alluded to did not dissent. Mr. O'Connell said, "That her Majesty's life would not be safe if the Tories came into power; and he (Mr. O'Connell) declared solemnly, that he was convinced her Majesty would not live six months if that event took place. They should remember that English Kings and Princes, before now, had been murdered. The Duke of Buckingham had put his nephews to death." Now, without reading any further, did Mr. H. Grattan, I would ask, in his speech, say less than that? And, with regard to that individual's allusion to an illustrious personage who is not here,—I mean the King of Hanover,—I think it is my duty, in my place in this House, to state that her Majesty has not a subject in the realm more devotedly attached to her, or who would more willingly sacrifice his blood and life in her defence, than that Sovereign Prince. Yet we find these infamous statements concerning him openly made to the people of Ireland,—the most inflammable people in the world,—unreproved and uncensured. We find, moreover, if report speak truly, that, through the agency of the Honourable Member for Dublin, the Noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Normanby) is endeavouring to thrust out of power the Noble Viscount near him. Good God! I should like to see such a Government. If the Noble Viscount is disposed to yield his sceptre to the Noble Marquess, let him do so, and we shall meet him in a straightforward and determined manner; and the country will soon see whether such a miserable association—(I do not use the expression personally, but I mean miserable in point of policy, and in point of influence)—can stand. I am happy to have had an opportunity of expressing my sentiments on these most base and infamous speeches that have been made in Ireland; and I feel convinced that those who deal in such calumnies will, in the end, be visited by the just contempt of society.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. —I can assure the Noble Marquess that I have no intention of gratifying his wishes, by assuming the reins of Government.

GOVERNMENT MAIL PACKETS.

The EARL of WICKLOW.—I wish to put a question to the Noble Earl at the head of the Admiralty on a subject which has recently become very important, in consequence of the facility which the Liverpool Railway affords for communication with Dublin. Before the management of the mail packets was transferred from the Post Office to the Admiralty, great advantage was derived from the Government packets conveying parcels of a certain weight, at a moderate charge, across the Channel. If the convenience were great at that time, it is infinitely greater now, in consequence of the formation of the railway. Since the transfer, the Admiralty have thought it necessary to appoint an agent for the transmission of parcels. I do not complain of the appointment in itself, but I complain that it was bestowed in such a manner as to confer on the agent a complete monopoly with respect to the transit of goods, and it enables him to impose such conditions as he pleases on their transit. The individual selected is Mr. Peter Purcell, who has been one of the prime agitators of Ireland,—a determined "Precursor," and an active supporter of a gentleman who has been a good deal spoken of this evening. In consequence, however, of his having called for a detailed "account of the funds" of the Precursor Society, I believe that Mr. Purcell is no longer patronised in that quarter. Under such circumstances, it is probable that he would not have been favoured with this appointment, now; but he received it in June last. Now, what I complain of is this,—that the agent thus appointed has a right to ask what sum he pleases for the transit of goods; and, further, that he may refuse to take them at all, unless he is employed to forward them to whatsoever part of the country they are destined for. This is felt as a matter of great grievance and vexation by the other carriers in Dublin. I contend that the Noble Earl has no right to make an appointment to which such powers are attached. He ought not, for the sake of patronage, to have bestowed such a monopoly on any one individual. He has no right to deprive all other persons of the advantage of the transit of goods by those packets, unless they also commission the Government agent to send them to those places for which they are ultimately intended, and unless they agree to pay whatsoever sum he pleases to charge. I have, myself, felt the inconvenience of the system of which I complain; for many packages were transmitted to me from this country, and I found the charges so high that I was actually obliged to forego the benefit of the railroad. I wish to know whether it is intended to remove this evil?

The EARL of MINTO.—I feel much indebted to the Noble Earl for his courtesy in having intimated his intention to me to bring forward the subject, as by so doing I have been enabled to make such inquiries as place it in my power to give a satisfactory answer. Originally, the Post Office packets were not allowed to carry parcels at all; but in the course of 1837 the Admiralty packets were permitted to take such packages as are usually conveyed by mail coach. The superintendents of the Admiralty packets represented to the Post Office the great inconvenience of this, and wished the practice to be no longer continued. A communication to this effect was made to the Treasury; but the Treasury ordered an arrangement to be made for the transmission of such packages, and directed Commander Chappel, of the Post Office packet station at Liverpool, to make the best arrangement for such transmission. About a month afterwards an offer was made, through Commander Chappel, by Mr. Purcell, to undertake the conveyance of all parcels. I can assure the Noble Earl that the politics of Mr. Purcell, whether they be good, bad, or indifferent, are perfectly unknown at the Admiralty. Commander Chappel stated that this Mr. Purcell was a considerable coach proprietor in Ireland, and was, therefore, a likely person to undertake the arrangement. An arrangement was accordingly made with him as to the conveyance of those packages; but nothing of the nature of a monopoly was granted to him It was thought advisable that some person should be responsible to Government for the safe delivery of all packages, and that was the reason for the appointment. With regard to the future arrangement of the packets of the Admiralty, the contracts for the packets are, that they shall deliver the mails; they take no cognizance of them as passage boats for passengers or for parcels. The Admiralty have nothing to do with what they charge for them. If it be true that this gentleman has abused his privilege, it is quite obvious that parties may send their packages by other steamers.

The EARL of WICKLOW. — "It is quite obvious" to me that the Noble Earl does not clearly understand the position in which this agent is placed. I do not doubt it. I am aware that the Noble Earl has matters of greater importance to manage, and may not, therefore, have attended very closely to this: but I am always disposed to think that persons filling inferior positions are never guilty of abuses if proper superintendence be exercised over them; and therefore the responsibility rests with those whose duty it is to exercise that superintendence. It is evident that the Noble Earl does not understand the subject; for he says there is no monopoly, as parties can send by other packets. The very reason of establishing this mode of conveyance is, that the Post Office packets, from their greater velocity, afford better facilities for transmitting parcels; and this advantage is now monopolised, and the public are deprived of these except at unreasonable charges, — Mr. Purcell demanding what he likes.

The EARL of MINTO. — No doubt, there must be some slight fault to complain of; but if the Noble Earl had mentioned to the Admiralty that there was any irregularity, or any abuse or overcharge, the Admiralty would have paid immediate attention to such representation. I really know nothing of the manner in which Mr. Purcell proceeds.

The EARL of WICKLOW. — I know that.

The EARL of MINTO. — I understand that Mr. Purcell undertakes to deliver the parcels to the parties to whom they are addressed.

EDUCATION (NATIONAL).

LORD BROUGHAM. — I beg leave to present a petition from the Baptists of Coate, in favour of the national education scheme, and asserting that the clergy of the established church have no right to assume the exclusive education of the children of the people.

Ordered to lie on the table.

LORD BROUGHAM.—As regards my Bill on education, my only reason for abstaining from pressing it forward, hitherto, has been my reluctance to enter into polemical controversy; but I am not, now, disposed to abstain any longer from proceeding with it. With respect to the Government plan, nothing can be more absurd than the stories going about, that it is for a great system of national education; on the contrary, it is very limited in its nature. But my Bill embraces every part of the subject, and will, therefore, afford your Lordships full scope for the discussion of it. As to the time of bringing the measure forward, I think I shall best consult the convenience of both sides of the House, by naming Thursday week.

The EARL of WINCHILSEA and the BISHOP of LONDON presented petitions against the plan recommended by the Privy Council, — of members of the Bath Church of England Lay Association: and of inhabitants of Iver; Blendworth; Saint Asaph; Derby; Wingham; Leicester; and Leasingham.

On presenting several of the above petitions, —

The BISHOP of LONDON said: — I have several petitions to present, of a contrary nature to that from Coate, presented by the Noble and Learned Lord, against the scheme of national education. The petitioners to whom the Noble and Learned Lord has alluded, suppose the clergy to be claiming the exclusive education of the people. That is a claim which was never put forward by the clergy. They claim a right to the exclusive education only of the children of the Church of England, — a right which, by God's blessing, they will never recede from.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE. — My Noble Friend in the other House has not put forward any such extravagant and abominable pretension as that adverted to by the Noble and Learned Lord. Such a pretension, however, is believed to be avowed on the part of the Church of England. The plan proposed by my Noble Friend for the partial training of schoolmasters for the accommodation of all classes, has been objected to by persons in high authority, and connected with the Church of England, on grounds utterly untenable, except on the ground that the Church of England should enjoy a monopoly of the education of youth. I am glad to hear from the Right Reverend Prelate that he distinctly denies this. I will not now detain your Lordships by going into any detail on the subject; but I thought it due to the Right Reverend Prelate to exempt him from the charge of entertaining that inordinate pretension which has been held in different places.

The BISHOP of LONDON. — I only wish to say one word in reply to what has just fallen from the Noble Marquess. The Noble Marquess says that I have disclaimed, on my own part, and on that of the church, the pretension to which he has alluded. I did not presume to speak on behalf of the church. I stated my own opinion, and what I believe to be the opinion of the church at large. I am unwilling to put myself forward as the representative of the church on this occasion. What I stated was, that the clergy of the Church of England claimed the exclusive education only of the children of their own persuasion.

Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Also, a petition of the committee of the Derby and Derbyshire Auxiliary Established Church Society. — Read, and ordered to be received as the petition of J. G. Howard (chairman), who, only, has signed it.

THE MAURITIUS.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — My Lords, I beg to observe, with respect to the Mauritius, that though I have as yet received no official communication from the island, I have information from colonial newspapers of the 3d of March, which have been put into my hands, to the effect that the Order in Council has arrived out there, and has been proclaimed, and that total emancipation was to take place almost immediately.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I am extremely glad to hear it. It is a cruel thing to think that slavery should have existed longer, by six months, in the Island of Mauritius, than in any other of the British colonies, whether Crown or chartered colonies, when, in reality, emancipation ought to have come into operation sooner, there, than anywhere else. I say sooner than anywhere else, because, by the owners' own accounts, it is admitted that 1 in 3, or 1000 out of 3000 slaves, were imported into the country in direct defiance of the law, by which such importation was made a capital felony. This is the amount admitted; but, in reality, not fewer than one half of the whole number of slaves in the island were imported under the connivance of various persons who have been in authority at different times, and who, for their conduct in that respect, ought to have been impeached.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH.

The EARL of WINCHILSEA presented a petition against any measure having for its object the reduction of cathedral dignities, — of clergy of the Church of England in the deanery of Sutton and diocese of Canterbury. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

ESTABLISHED CHURCH (CANADA).

churchwardens, and others of Leominster; Caynham; Brewood; and Birmingham. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CHURCH DISCIPLINE BILL.

The Earl of Winchilsea and the Bishop of Exeter presented petitions against, — of the archdeacon, clergy of the archdeaconry, and others of Durham: of clergy of the archdeaconry of Sudbury: of clergy of the deanery of West Cornwall; and Eaton: and of clergy and laity of Ashby de la Zouche.

On presenting several of the above petitions, —

The BISHOP of EXETER said: — I will take this opportunity of stating, in consequence of something that occurred the other night, what my habit is with respect to the petitions of my clergy. It is my habit, when any important measure affecting the church is about to be submitted to Parliament, to consult my clergy through the medium of my archdeacons; and, on a late occasion, I permitted the publication, in a country newspaper, of a letter addressed by me to one of those officers for that purpose. I beg to add, that I shall continue to pursue this course, because I think that, as the clergy have no longer an opportunity of recording their sentiments on meeting in the two houses of convocation, they ought to have an opportunity of meeting, privately or otherwise, and apprising their bishops of the result of their deliberations respecting measures touching the interests of the church.

Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The ARCHBISHOP of CANTERBURY. — Instead of moving that the House do now go into committee on the Church Discipline Bill, I consider it expedient to save your Lordships a great deal of discussion, which will be necessary as to its details. I beg to move that the Bill be referred to a select committee up-stairs.

The BISHOP of EXETER. — I beg leave to express my warm concurrence in the proposition of the Most Reverend Prelate. It is much better that the Bill should be discussed calmly and quietly in a committee up-stairs. The subject is not one for an exciting debate.

The Bill was then, accordingly, referred to a select committee, to consider and report: the Lords following were named of the committee; and the committee to meet on Wednesday next, at two o'clock: —

The Archbishop of Canterbury,
The Lord Chancellor,
The Archbishop of York,
The Lord President,
The Duke of Wellington,
The Earl of Devon,
The Earl of Dartmouth,
The Lord Bishop of London,
The Lord Bishop of Durham,

PRIVILEGE.

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON. — I wish to put a question to the Noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department, in reference to a petition which I presented on Wednesday last, from several respectable gentlemen of the town of Bedford, stating, in substance, that an officer, holding an appointment under the Crown (Mr. John Hyde, receiving inspector of taxes for the county of Bedford), on seeing in the hands of Mr. Joseph Brown, of Bedford, surveyor of taxes for the same county, a petition to the House of Commons against the scheme of education proposed by Government, laid violent hands upon it, and, using violent language, tore it to pieces, and stamped upon the fragments. Now, I am quite convinced that the Noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department will agree with me, that a person holding office under the Government is not justified in interfering with parties who are anxious to petition against any of the measures of that Government. The question I wish to ask the Noble Lord is, whether, under the circumstances, he will undertake to institute an inquiry on the subject?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I certainly think the statement contained in the petition forms a sufficient ground for instituting an inquiry into the circumstances of the case. But I would observe that it does not appear from the petition, that any of the persons signing it was one of the petitioners in question, or was present when the circumstances alluded to took place.

Mr. ALSTON. — Sir, I have been requested to state to the House, that at the time the transaction complained of took place, Mr. Hyde was dining in a private room at the inn, with a Mr. Brown, a friend of his, when some person came in and asked him for the Standard newspaper. He replied, that he had not the Standard, but could lend the Morning Chronicle. The stranger then retired, observing that he never read the Morning Chronicle, and that if it were put into his hands he would throw it into the fire. In the course of the same day, another person, unknown to Mr. Hyde, but whom he believed to be the waiter of the hotel, came into the room and placed a paper in the hands of Mr. Brown, who read a part of it. Mr. Hyde soon found out that the petition was against the Government plan of education; and being aware that the people of Bedford knew that he was a Dissenter, and a man of strong feelings and political bias, he felt that this paper — to which he was ignorant that a single signature had been attached — was sent in for the purpose of insulting him. He therefore took it out of the hands of Mr. Brown and tore it; but he denies that he used the strong expressions attributed to him in the petition, which charges him with having uttered, at the time of destroying the paper, the words "Damnation to the petition, to the parsons, and to the church!" Mr. Hyde has assured me — (and I certainly do not believe that a more honourable or high-minded man exists than Mr. Hyde) — that such words never passed his lips, and that he should be ashamed to have used them; but, conceiving that an insult was intended him, he certainly did tear the petition, uttering at the same time the word "Damnation!"

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

Mr. Hyde has been in the office he now fills since 1803, and was appointed by Mr. Pitt. No officer has ever performed his duty more to the satisfaction of the board. Mr. Hyde regrets exceedingly, that, in a moment of irritation, he should have made use of the expression he did. These are the circumstances of the case; and I would confidently ask whether the subject is one upon which the House ought to institute an inquiry?

Mr. F. BARING. — I can certainly bear testimony to the high character of Mr. Hyde as a public officer; and would also put it to the House whether, under the circumstances, it is a matter in which the House ought to proceed any further?

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON. — As Mr. Hyde has not attempted to justify his conduct, but merely to palliate it, I will not pursue the case any further. I am sure the petitioners will be quite satisfied with having brought the case under the notice of the House. The petition having been put into my hands, I felt it my duty to present it, and to call the attention of the House to the statement it contained.

SLAVERY IN THE MAURITIUS.

SIR S. LUSHINGTON. — Seeing the Right Honourable Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies in his place, I wish to ask him whether, or not, negro apprenticeship has been abolished in the Island of the Mauritius? if abolished, at what period? and if not, why that abolition has not taken place?

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — From the official despatches received at the Colonial Office, I cannot say whether negro apprenticeship has been completely put an end to, or not, in the Mauritius. I have, however, this day, seen a newspaper of the Mauritius, dated the 11th of March, which leaves no doubt upon my mind, that the Orders in Council have been received in the Mauritius, and that the Governor has proclaimed them, and has fixed the 31st day of last March for the termination of negro apprenticeship in that island.

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

LORD ASHLEY. — I beg to ask the Noble Secretary for the Home Department whether it is his intention to move the proposed grant for national education on Friday next?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Certainly; supposing the debate on Canada does not extend beyond Thursday.

LORD ASHLEY. — Under those circumstances, I cannot, at present, fix any day for the call of the House. I think the new scheme proposed by the Noble Lord is not less objectionable than his first plan, and I shall certainly take the sense of the House upon it.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT (IRELAND).

Mr. LITTON. — I beg to know whether it is the intention of the Government to bring in a Bill to extend the principle of the abolition of imprisonment for debt to Ireland? and if so, whether the Bill will contain the same provisions as the English Bill?

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. — I think it is desirable to introduce a Bill for that purpose, but with such modifications as the circumstances of the country may render requisite.

CANADA.

Mr. MACLEAN. — I wish to learn from the Noble Lord whether the Government intend to take into consideration the conduct of Captain Drew and Lieutenant M'Cormack, who were concerned in the affair of the Caroline in Upper Canada, with a view to their promotion?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I do not think it expedient to answer any question with regard to the promotion or rewards which may be bestowed on particular officers by the Sovereign; and the delicate nature of the circumstance to which the Honourable Member's question refers would make such a course, on my part, peculiarly objectionable.

LORD VISCOUNT EASTNOR. — I beg to ask whether those Gallant Gentlemen who served in the navy, and afterwards settled in Canada, who were called upon by the Lieutenant Governor to assist in forming an armament, and who performed many gallant exploits when so employed, have received any compensation for their general services?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I can only repeat the answer I have already given to the Honourable Member for Oxford.

MEDICAL EVIDENCE.

Mr. WAKLEY. — Sir, I wish to ask a question of the Noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department. In the winter of 1833 there was a committee appointed to inquire into the state of medical education. The Honourable Member for Bridport was a member of that committee, which sat the whole of the Session. A great deal of valuable information was elicited, and part of the evidence taken by the committee was printed. The question I wish to ask is,— why the remaining portion of the evidence has not been printed? It is a subject of great interest to the members of the medical profession, and they are exceedingly anxious to know whether there is any chance of the remaining portion of the evidence being published. The members of the profession are aware that there is a difficulty in preparing the evidence for publication, from the great confusion into which the papers have been thrown, in consequence of the fire which took place in the Houses of Parliament; and they do not wish to put the Government to any inconvenience; but so much time has now elapsed, that they begin to apprehend they will not see the rest of the evidence at all.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — The Honourable Member for Bridport would be better able to answer the question put to me by the Honourable Gentleman than I am.

SIR R. PEEL. — Sir, the Honourable Gentleman should be cautious; the missing papers may contain something that might, by possibility, reflect on the characters of some members of the profession.

Mr. WAKLEY. — My answer to that is, — that the members of the profession, themselves, are exceedingly anxious to have the testimony given before the committee printed. They want it printed, in order that a good Medical Reform Bill may be founded upon it. The Honourable Member for Bridport has assured me that no efforts of his shall be left untried, in order to get the evidence ready.

CANADA.

LORD STANLEY. — Sir, I wish to give the Noble Lord notice, in reference to the question of Canada, that I will, on Thursday next, take the sense of the House upon the expediency of pledging the House, by an abstract resolution, to the principle of union between Upper and Lower Canada.

STOCKDALE v. HANSARD.

LORD HOWICK brought up a special Report from the Committee of Privileges, to which had been referred the consideration of the proceedings in the case of "Stockdale v. Hansard;" which was read at the table by the clerk. The Report stated that the Attorney General had reported to the committee, that notice had been that day given to the defendant, of a writ of inquiry having issued to assess the damages sustained by the plaintiff in the action; and that it appeared to the committee, that while it was expedient to inquire into the circumstances under which the judgment was given, it was not expedient that, on the assessment of damages, the defendant should appear by counsel.

PAPERS.

Spain.—Copy presented,—of papers relative to the war in Spain (by command).

Netherlands and Belgium.—Copies presented,—of treaties relative to the Netherlands and Belgium (by command).

East India Correspondence.—Copy presented,—of additional Post Office convention for the conveyance through France of correspondence between England and the East Indies (by command).

To lie on the table.

In presenting the two last-named papers, VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said: — Sir, these papers contain the treaties by which is concluded the final settlement of the Belgian question. The ratifications were only exchanged on Saturday last, and I have now great pleasure in laying the papers before the House. The other is a Post Office convention between Great Britain and France, for the purpose of facilitating the transmission of letters between the two countries.

BISHOP OF UPPER CANADA.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — I wish to ask the Right Honourable Gentleman the Under Secretary for the Colonies, whether the information I have received is correct, that Archdeacon Strachan has been appointed Bishop of Upper Canada? and whether it is the intention of Government to give him a salary? and if so, whether he is to retain the emoluments of his office as archdeacon? I also wish to ask whether any arrangements have been made by the Government to relieve the Bishop of Montreal from the pluralities with which he is encumbered, and with respect to which the Bishop of Montreal has made a complaint which appears in Lord Durham's Report? and, also, whether it is the intention of Government to provide the Bishop of Montreal with a sufficient income, after he shall have relinquished a part of the appointments which he now holds.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — Sir, in answer to the Honourable Member, I beg to say, that a great desire was expressed that there should be a Bishop of Upper Canada, and the Government intimated that they were perfectly ready to appoint one, provided no additional charge upon the country would be created by such appointment. Archdeacon Strachan expressed his willingness to accept of the appointment on these terms,—holding, of course, his present emoluments, but without any increase to his income; and the Government, having consulted the Archbishop of Canterbury upon the appointment, intimated their readiness to carry the arrangement into effect. We thought, however, that to consult the Bishop of Montreal, who was at present Bishop of Upper Canada, would be only respectful to that prelate; and, accordingly, till his opinion upon the subject has been received, the final step in Archdeacon Strachan's appointment will not be taken. As to the second question put to me by the Honourable Gentleman,—namely, whether or not it is intended, on the part of the Government, to make any increase in the income of the Bishop of Montreal,—I have to state that it is not the intention of Government to ask the House this year for a greater sum than was asked for last year, towards the maintenance of that see, — namely, 1000*l.*; which, together with 900*l.* derived from local sources, constitute his present income.

SHERIFFS IN SLIGO.

Mr. SOMERS. — Sir, I beg to ask the Honourable and Gallant Member for Sligo county, whether it is his intention to bring before the House, on Friday, the subject of the petition lately presented by him?

COLONEL PERCEVAL. — I am not quite certain whether the state of business in the House will enable me to bring forward the petition of which I have given notice, respecting the conduct of partisan sheriffs in Sligo. Further, I am not quite certain that I ought to bring it forward, just now; inasmuch as I understand that a similar petition has been presented in the other House of Parliament, and has been referred to the committee now sitting on the state of Ireland. At present, therefore, I cannot answer the question put to me by the Honourable Gentleman.

CANADA.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Sir, with regard to the motion of which the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire has given notice, it may be convenient to the House that I should state, that the course which I shall take upon the Canada question will depend on that which may be taken by the Noble Lord; and, when this is explained, it will be for the Government to determine whether they think it necessary to press the resolutions to a division. If the Noble Lord cannot agree to the principle of union between the two provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, then I shall press the first resolution; but if, on the other hand, the Noble Lord should merely not think it advisable that the House should pledge itself to a measure before the details of it are prepared, then I will withdraw the resolution, move for leave to bring in a Bill, and lay the Bill on the table of the House.

LORD STANLEY. — Sir, I have no objection to repeat the precise terms of my motion, which are these: — that on Thursday next I shall take the sense of the House as to the expediency of pledging the House, by an abstract resolution, to the principle of union between Upper and Lower Canada.

LORD VISCOUNT EASTNOR. — I wish to ask a question of the Noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department. There are some gallant gentlemen who have settled in Upper Canada for the purpose of cultivating the land, and who, having recently been called on to form an armament for the defence of the country, not only did so, but performed some very gallant exploits. I wish to know whether it is the intention of Government to take any steps to reward those gallant individuals, as I have been informed that they have not received any compensation?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Sir, I can only give the same answer to that question as I gave to a similar question put by the Honourable and Learned Member for Oxford a few minutes ago.

SIR R. PEEL. — It seems to me that it would be advisable to come to some distinct understanding upon the subject of the notice given by my Noble Friend the Member for North Lancashire; and I cannot but think it inconvenient, that the course to be pursued by her Majesty's Government is to depend on the speech of the Noble Lord. If the Noble Lord, the Secretary for the Home Department, will recollect, my course some time back was this; — I said that, if it was not proposed in the present Session to legislate on the subject of a union between the Canadas, I should object to fettering the House by a resolution on an abstract question. If, therefore, the Noble Lord intends to withdraw his resolution, and to bring in a Bill for the purpose of effecting such union, I apprehend that there will be no opposition to that course. Therefore, without putting my Noble Friend to the trouble of entering into the whole topic, I trust the Noble Lord will ask for leave in the ordinary way to bring in a Bill.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I think there would be great evil in taking a division upon this question, which might be interpreted in Canada as a division upon the principle of a union; whereas it would only be a division upon the expediency of entering into resolutions at a time when no Bill was before the House. I feel this very strongly; and, in consequence of the objections taken by the Noble Lord and the Right Honourable Gentleman, I shall withdraw the resolutions, and at once move for leave to bring in a Bill, and fix an early day for the second reading.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — Does the Noble Lord mean to say that he expects such a Bill to pass during the present Session?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I propose to move the second reading this Session; but, with the strong resolutions of the Assembly of Upper Canada before me, I do not think I shall be prepared with final legislation this Session.

Mr. C. BULLER. — I beg to ask the Noble Lord whether he means, also, to give up the second resolution? because that is the resolution to which I am opposed.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Sir, with regard to the second resolution, I shall take a course precisely the same as that by which I propose to withdraw the first. I shall move for leave to bring in a Bill.

HAMBURGH AND LUBECK.

JAMAICA BILL.

The House then resolved itself into committee on this Bill.

Clause 1. "Governor, with advice of council, to make laws or ordinances under certain circumstances."

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — Sir, I move that this clause do stand part of the Bill.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — Sir, in rising to make the motion of which I have given notice, I should wish, first, to draw the attention of the committee to what the question before them is not; — because I very much apprehend that Gentlemen are labouring under a delusion in that respect, and I believe that we are about to enter upon a discussion of a question which has nothing to do with that really under consideration. The committee are not about to discuss the question between master and slave, but that which has arisen between the House of Assembly and her Majesty's Government at home. The question between master and slave was brought before the House when her Majesty's Government introduced a proposition with respect to the termination of negro apprenticeship. It will perhaps be in the recollection of the committee, that, upon that occasion, I did not hesitate to express myself in very strong terms against the conduct of the planters towards the negroes. I must, however, observe that the Right Honourable Gentleman the Judge Advocate (Sir G. Grey) entirely misapplied what I then said, when he spoke of my remarks as showing that this House ought to legislate against the Assembly of Jamaica. I shall be able to show that the course which I then took was entirely consistent with the course which I am now about to take. On that occasion I not only entertained the same view of the question as that adopted by her Majesty's Government, but I also suggested various clauses for the benefit of the negro population, and which were approved of by her Majesty's Government, and made part of the Bill. I do not mention this for the purpose of taking any credit to myself for anything I humbly did in this House, but merely to show that I have always been actuated by a sincere desire for the negroes' welfare. The question now before the House is a question which has arisen since the Emancipation Act; and that very Act has itself ceased, in consequence of apprenticeship being abolished, and of every man in Jamaica, whatever his colour might be, being equally free. The Government have abandoned their intention of suspending the constitution of Jamaica; but I must still, in a few words, recal the attention of the committee to the circumstances under which the Government introduced their Bill for that purpose. The Right Honourable Gentleman opposite must have thought such a course necessary, because he has said that, even now, he has not changed the opinions which he then entertained, and that he believes the proper course will be a suspension of the constitution. It is therefore my duty to draw attention strictly to the circumstances which, in the opinion of the Right Honourable Gentleman, justified the measure of the Government, but which, I must contend, amounted to no justification whatever. It may not be difficult to show, on the part of the Government, some grounds for the course which has been pursued; but I have no hesitation in saying that the acts of the Government, and the proceedings of the Governor, — their want of knowledge of the actual laws and constitution of Jamaica, — have led to that line of conduct on the part of the Assembly which has influenced the Government to propose the suspension of the constitution. I, however, beg at the outset to state, — and to state distinctly, — that I am not here to uphold the conduct of the House of Assembly in every part; I could not justify the protest of that body, nor give my opinion in favour of some part of the resolutions which they have passed. I think the conduct of the Members of the House of Assembly, unexplained and unaccompanied by any statement of their objects, in some respects indefensible; and I have never entertained a doubt that the Imperial Parliament have the power to legislate for Jamaica when circumstances render it absolutely necessary to have recourse to such a line of policy. The difficulty is, to ascertain when it becomes the duty of Parliament to interfere; and the question in the present instance is, whether a case has arisen to justify the Imperial Legislature in superseding the legislative functions of the House of Assembly? And it is because I fully admit so great a power, that I am anxious we should be most cautious and deliberate in the exercise of it. I trust the committee will do me the favour to attend to the difference which exists between the present case and that which occupied the attention of the House on a former occasion, when a Bill for amending the Emancipation Act was considered, and they will see that the measures now contemplated are not justified by the occasion. I would press upon the committee, and upon the Government, to consider the provisions of the Bill for amending the Emancipation Act, and the inference to be drawn from that Act relative to the views of the Government with respect to Jamaica. That Act imposes heavy pains and penalties, but it does not propose to suspend the legislative fuctions of the colony. Government, by that Act, imposed upon the planters the exact penalties which, in their opinion, the nature of the case called for; but there they stopped. They were not, then, prepared to suspend the constitution of Jamaica, — they were not prepared to proceed to such an extremity at that time. The penalties of the Act for amending the Emancipation Act were deemed sufficient, and no more severe proceeding was contemplated. At the time that Act was passed, it was impossible to anticipate whether the House of Assembly would put an end to the system of apprenticeship before the expiration of the time at which the Imperial Parliament had resolved that it should cease; and we were, in consequence, unwilling to apply our consideration to that object while we were without evidence with respect to the intentions of the Assembly, and when no provision had yet been made to meet the change in the circumstances of the negroes, which would take place on their obtaining perfect freedom. When the Act for amending the Emancipation Act reached Jamaica, and when it had been communicated by the Governor to the House of Assembly, that body, without any delay, proceeded to consider the subject of apprenticeship, and almost immediately passed as full and complete a measure of emancipation as this House or the country could possibly desire.

Now, I ask, was that a measure affording any evidence of unwillingness on the part of the House of Assembly to act in a sincere and friendly spirit towards the negroes? and was it not a measure calculated to conciliate this country, and to entitle the House of Assembly to the respect and support of Parliament? Jamaica did more than we had any right to expect from her. Disregarding her own rights, she granted complete emancipation, in order to conciliate this country, and to meet the wishes of the Imperial Legislature. The Act for amending the Emancipation Act wounded her feelings and violated her constitutional rights; and, although I assented to that Act, I do not wonder that Jamaica has manifested resentment against a measure which was so calculated to rouse her indignation. A correspondence took place between the Governor and the House of Assembly, relative to the Bill for terminating the system of apprenticeship; and to that correspondence I would here call the attention of the committee. The Governor, in relation to that measure, addressed the council and the members of the House of Assembly in the following terms: —

> Jamaica is in your hands; she requires repose by the removal of a law which has equally tormented the labourer, and disappointed the planter; a law by which man constrains man in unnatural servitude. This is her first exigency.

> Jamaica, for her future welfare, appeals to your wisdom to legislate in the spirit of the times, with liberality and benevolence towards all classes.

Nothing can be more distinct than this appeal of the Governor. And the reply of the Assembly? They said, —

> We shall proceed, in the critical posture in which the island is placed, to give to the momentous matters submitted to us our most serious consideration. Jamaica does, indeed, require repose; and we anxiously hope that, should we determine to remove an unnatural servitude, we shall be left in the exercise of our constitutional privileges, to legislate for the benefit of all classes, without any further parliamentary interference.

Is there anything in that reply which can be considered as indicating anything like reluctance on the part of the House of Assembly to legislate in the spirit of the times? Is there anything indicating hostility to the negroes, opposition to the wishes of this country, or unwillingness to take the necessary steps to meet the change in the circumstances of the colony, which would arise on the termination of the apprenticeship system? No such inference is to be drawn from the reply of the House of Assembly; and all that body contend for is, that they should be left in the free exercise of their constitutional rights. The feelings of the House of Assembly are in accordance with the wishes of the people of this country; and I am prepared to show that it is the conduct of the Government, and the proceedings of the Governor, which have tended to alter those feelings, — and to induce that Assembly to adopt the course which Ministers now complain of. After the Act for final emancipation had passed the Legislature of Jamaica, the House of Assembly was prorogued, — the prorogation taking place on the 16th of June; — and, now, let me ask what the conduct of the Governor was, while the Assembly was separated, and while it was impossible for that body to have any communication with his Excellency? The first act of the Governor, to which I would call the attention of the committee, was one of great importance, as it indicated a wish to supersede the authority of the Colonial Legislature, and was calculated to wound the feelings of the House of Assembly. The committee will remember that the circumstance to which I am about to allude occurred while the Assembly was prorogued, and when that body had not the power of replying. It was an attack made behind their backs, which the members of the House of Assembly had no opportunity of repelling. I now come to the circumstance, itself. In a despatch from Sir Lionel Smith to Lord Glenelg, his Excellency says, —

I am anxious to draw your Lordship's attention to the Act of this island, 5 Will. IV. c. 2., for enlarging the powers of justices in determining complaints between masters and servants, &c. This Act has already been found to operate with great severity against the European emigrants; and the friends of the negro are naturally apprehensive that it may be converted into a powerful engine of oppression against the labourers, as it gives authority to a single justice to apprehend, under his warrant, servants in husbandry who absent themselves or neglect to fulfil their contract, and punish them by hard labour, not exceeding three months, or by forfeiture of wages.

Now, let the committee mark what follows. His Excellency adds, —

I hope your Lordship will be enabled to rid us of this Act, either by a formal disallowance, or by the authority of the Imperial Parliament.

The committee will therefore see that, after the House of Assembly had passed the final Emancipation Act, and after the Governor had appealed to the wisdom of that body to legislate in the spirit of the times, and with liberality and benevolence towards all classes, his first step was to apply to the Colonial Secretary to disallow an Act of the island, or to effect its repeal by an application to the Imperial Parliament. His Excellency first expressed confidence in the wisdom of the House of Assembly; and then, instead of applying to that body, he, on the first occasion, asked the Crown to disallow an Act of the island, or to have it repealed by the Imperial Legislature. A worse instance of bad faith, I must say, I never witnessed. In reply to the despatch of his Excellency, Lord Glenelg said "that the Act alluded to had been too long in operation to be disallowed;" the Government did not fall into the views of the Governor, and so the matter terminated. The next instance of bad faith to which I shall allude affords a still stronger instance of the ungracious mode in which the Assembly has been treated. On the 10th of September, 1838, the Governor, writing to the Colonial Secretary, says, —

I beseech your Lordship to look to the provisions of the Local Vagrant Act, unrepealed, — 35 Chas. II. c. 11. This Act was introduced against the lawless soldiery of Governor Doyley; and many violent planters are now rejoicing in the power it gives them of flogging free men from parish to parish; and there is an improvement in its penal powers by the 2d Geo. III. c. 11., still unrepealed, which adds six months' hard labour in the House of Correction. Your Lordship may bid me apply to the Legislature to repeal these frightful laws; but I should apply in vain; and, in the midst of freedom, we have still terrific engines of oppression and tyranny preparing for the emancipated population.

Such was the language which the Governor addressed to the Colonial Secretary relative to the Assembly. They are represented as clinging to "terrific engines of oppression," and ready to carry "the most frightful laws" into operation against the emancipated population. Thus the Governor appeals to the Imperial Parliament for that which he had never asked the Assembly to carry into effect. This is one of my reasons for charging him with bad faith. In a subsequent part of the discussion, I shall further show that the Governor actually knew nothing of the very laws against which he was writing; nothing, in fact, of the laws of Jamaica; and when I add to this the strong feelings and passion he has exhibited in his transactions with the Assembly, I think I shall have accounted for the so-much-censured conduct of that body. But the Act for final emancipation is a proof that the Assembly was willing to go even beyond their duty, to conciliate the wishes of the people of this country; and yet, with that proof of the liberality of the House of Assembly before him, the Governor wrote to the Colonial Secretary to obtain the interference of the Imperial Parliament,—and that application was made before the House of Assembly had been even appealed to. These, certainly, are two of the grossest instances of bad faith I have ever witnessed. To what, then, is the conduct of the Governor to be attributed, except to a feeling of hostility and prejudice against the House of Assembly? There was no ground for the accusations he made; and was it fair, in such a manner, to attack a body who had not the power of reply? I should like to know what the feeling of the House of Assembly must have been, when they met, on the 30th of October, if they had known that such despatches had been forwarded to the Home Government? The Colonial Secretary, too, fell into the same error as the Governor. The Right Honourable Gentleman opposite told us, on a previous evening, that those "terrific engines" existed,—that the negroes might be flogged from parish to parish under the "most frightful laws;" and called for the interference of this House to put an end to such "revolting tyranny." Now, the fact is, that no such laws exist; there are no "terrific engines" or "frightful laws" which could be brought into operation against the negroes. Surely, then, when the Governor called for the repeal or disallowance of laws which the Government ought to have known had no existence in reality, it was the duty of Ministers to have looked into the actual state of the case, and not to have allowed themselves to be influenced by the representations of his Excellency, who was evidently actuated by a strong feeling of prejudice against the Assembly. When the Bill for amending the Emancipation Act was under consideration, the House could have no means of knowing whether Jamaica would or would not terminate voluntarily the apprenticeship system before 1840; but although it was not generally known, yet the Government had information of the passing of the Act for final emancipation, on the day the Prisons Bill was introduced into the other House of Parliament. Now, after passing the Emancipation Act, could, I would ask, any measure have been framed more calculated to rouse the indignation of the Assembly than the Prisons Bill? If the Jamaica Assembly had refused to emancipate the apprentices, and chosen to retain their rights till 1840, there might have been some reason for the Government interfering in the internal affairs of the colony; but after the Assembly had complied in the most ample manner with the wishes of the Government, of both Houses of Parliament, and of this country, interference could not be justified. The Prisons Bill was not introduced as a punishment to Jamaica, but as affecting all the colonies. But this is no defence; the Bill was introduced without any application having been previously made to ascertain whether Prisons Bills would be prepared by the legislative bodies in those colonies without the interference of Parliament. It was impossible for Jamaica not to look on such a measure with jealousy, as it was a direct interference, by the Imperial Parliament, with the local affairs of the colony, which nothing short of absolute necessity could have justified.

But this is not all. The first act of the Governor, in promulgating the Prisons Act, was to copy the very rules and regulations which, in 1834, had been introduced into the Act of the House of Assembly. So that, in point of fact, the Governor was forced to resort to the legislation of the House of Assembly, in order to carry into execution the Act which had passed the Imperial Parliament! The colonial Legislature had framed the best rules and regulations for the prisons of the island, and the Governor adopted them; and yet the House of Assembly were held by the Government to be incapable of legislating for the welfare of the people, or of taking those steps which the altered condition of the colony required. Could anything be more unjust than such a course? and was it possible that the House of Assembly should not feel indignant at such treatment? It may be said, by the Right Honourable Gentleman, that the feelings of the people of this country have been strongly excited by the condition of the negroes; but it is the duty of the Government to protect the Assembly from the aspersions which have been cast upon that body, and not to give way to any excitement which may happen to prevail. It has been said that the Prisons Bill affected Barbadoes also. True, such is the case; but there is a great difference between the legislative and the Crown colonies. The Crown colonies, having no Legislature, are governed by the Colonial Secretary, and by Acts of the Imperial Parliament; but it is not so in the legislative colonies. There the internal affairs are regulated by the local Legislatures; and it is natural that such bodies should be jealous of the interference of Parliament· and surely it would be useless to have local legislative bodies at all, if the Government are continually to interfere, or the Colonial Secretary is to disallow all the Acts which they may frame. With the recollection of the unpleasant circumstances which took place in reference to measures passed by the colonial Assembly, and the interference, as it was termed, of the Imperial Parliament with those measures, I think there is reason to complain of the Governor, as having exhibited a want of caution, in first proroguing the Assembly too abruptly, and then in calling them together too early, without allowing sufficient time to elapse in order that the feeling of irritation which had been provoked might be, in some measure, allayed. Under all the circumstances, I confess that I am not surprised that there should have been a disinclination, on the part of the Assembly, to engage in legislation; and I entertain a strong impression that mild and conciliatory measures would have prevented all those evils which have taken place, and that this House and the country would thus have been spared those discussions which have occupied so much time hitherto. But as it is, there is no foundation for coming to this House to ask for powers for the Governor, which could not be maintained on grounds contained in former Acts. If the Right Honourable Gentleman pleads a particular case, and argues that the necessity of the case calls for such a proceeding, I shall be able to answer that, by putting the question as to whether or not the Assembly of Jamaica is to have a locus pœnitentiæ allowed to it by this Bill? I would, however, go further; and I would show that it is a mere farce to call the Bill a means for allowing the Assembly to fall into its former course of legislation. Besides, the real offence of the Assembly has never been correctly stated. What that body did resolve was, that, until her Majesty should be pleased to tell them whether or not they were to be allowed the exercise of their constitutional rights, they would decline legislation, except so far as to satisfy the public creditor. What was it the Governor did then? He first prorogued the Assembly, then dissolved it, then called it together, and then prorogued it again.

The Right Honourable Gentleman (Mr. Labouchere), in opening the case, said he should first introduce a provision to enable the Government to pass such temporary laws as might be necessary in case the Assembly would not act. The clause containing that provision in the first Bill is now so far changed in the second Bill, that the power of the Governor is not made contingent on any such circumstance. As I understand, however, that the Government do not mean to make the power of the Governor contingent, I will not oppose the clause. On the contrary, if the Assembly are to have a fair opportunity of acting, let it be most distinctly understood, that, if they do not act when that opportunity is given, there is not a man in this House who will be more ready to give to the Government the powers necessary to carry on the legislation of the colony. But by the clause, as it stands at present, the council will be mere creatures in the hands of the Governor; and although that may be considered very proper, yet I think it important that the committee should know what powers are to be given to the Governor. If the Governor is to have power to remove all or any of the members of the Legislative Council and the Executive Council, his power over them will be so complete that he will be able to annul any measure he may please to treat so. Then, again, it is a very nice question whether, after a measure has been passed by the Governor and council, or by the Imperial Parliament, the Assembly may not repeal it? I am, therefore, prepared to give those powers which would enable the Governor and council to make temporary laws only in case the Assembly should refuse to act. I consider the first clause in the Bill unnecessary.

I now come at once to the question to which it is necessary I should address myself; that is,—Is there, or not, a necessity for the provisions which the Right Honourable Gentleman has introduced into the first clause, and which he has said could be no longer delayed, and were necessary for the protection of the generally emancipated population of Jamaica against the planters, their late masters? I shall be able to show that the laws the Right Honourable Gentleman considers to be so binding on that population, do not exist, and have not the slightest existence except in the minds of the Governor and the local officers, and of her Majesty's Government; and if I show that, I think I shall remove all the pretensions for this unsound legislation. The first question on the point is that with relation to vagrancy. The Act of Charles II. makes a man a vagrant who refuses to work for the usual wages; and it has been said that the statute of the 35th of George II. allows freemen (and negroes are now freemen, and that law, consequently, can be applied to them) to be whipped from parish to parish until they reach their homes; and it has been also said that the subsequent statute of George III. permits an additional punishment of hard labour; and, on these suggestions, the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite (Mr. Labouchere) has asked whether it was possible that the British Legislature would permit enormities of that kind to continue? The state of the law, just described, has been laid down by the Governor of Jamaica in the despatch to which I have already referred, and also in the answer of the colonial Government at home to that despatch, to be exactly as I have described. It would, however, have been as well if both those authorities had ascertained whether any such law as that of Charles II. was in existence, or not. Now, I mean to assert, without any fear of contradiction, that no such law now exists, or has any force; and, therefore, that the Governor of Jamaica was most grossly mistaken when he referred to that statute as one of tyranny and oppression against the emancipated population. I maintain that there is not the dot of an "i" or the cross of a "t" in the 35th Car. II., which has not been repealed, totally and entirely, by some subsequent Act. I say that no such powers are now in force; that there has been no resort to that law; that there has been no attempt to inflict the punishment it authorises; and that there has been no desire manifested to put it in practice;—so that all the representations of the Governor of Jamaica and of the Government at home are thus at once proved to be without foundation, if I can make out that the Act of Charles II. has ceased to be of force and effect. There is a rule of law which no one acquainted with such matters will venture to contradict,—that it is not necessary to have a special Act expressly for the purpose of repealing a former statute; but that, if the provisions of the subsequent Act are pregnant with a negative, then the former is altogether and virtually, although not expressly and in terms, repealed; and, therefore, if in this instance there is a provision in the later Act differing from the former, the later Act operates as a substitution for, and not as an addition to, the older statute.

Before I inquire into the provisions of the statute of Charles II., I must observe that these were Acts not levelled against the slaves at that time, but against the white and coloured population, including, also, soldiers who misconducted themselves. The first section of the statute of Charles II. directs that taxes shall be raised and expended in the erection of houses of correction. Now, that section is altogether repealed; for, by the next statute—the 32d of George III. s. 2.—it will be found that the justices, vestrymen, and members of the Assembly of each parish, should, with the churchwardens, erect and build houses of correction; and these parties, for that purpose, became and were created, a corporation. It is, therefore, clear that, in point of law, the first section of the statute of Charles II. was repealed by the second section of the later statute, 32d George III. Now, the second section of the Statute of Charles II. directs that every vagrant shall be apprehended and taken before a justice, who was to have power to order him or her to be whipped on the naked back with not exceeding thirty-nine lashes. Now, the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite has, on this subject, appealed to the feelings of the House,—an appeal which never is made in vain under proper circumstances; but, in this instance, that appeal has been made on grounds which do not exist,—upon statutes that are not in force, and upon punishments that are never inflicted, except in the imagination of the Governor of Jamaica, and the Government at home. For the House will bear in mind that the power of whipping, under the 35th Charles II., is superseded by the powers conferred by the 32d George III. upon the justices, to send a vagrant as a rogue and vagabond to the house of correction to be built under that Act. The management of those workhouses, or houses of correction, is given, under the last statute, to the justices, vestrymen, churchwardens, and members of the Assembly for each parish; and with them, by a still more recent statute, have been associated the special justices; and therefore, you have the best possible protection afforded against any abuse of power. This body corporate, to whom the management of the prisons is confided, has, it is said, still jurisdiction to inflict the amount of thirty-nine lashes upon any persons within their jurisdiction who should misbehave themselves. I shall, however, presently show that this corporation has no such power. Nay, I would undertake to receive all the lashes that, by law, could now be inflicted under it. I am not at all apprehensive of the pain I should endure in consequence. There is another provision in the Act of Charles II., with respect to binding poor children apprentices; and I had the curiosity to ascertain whether that clause was still in force; and I find that the 7th Geo. IV. cap. 26. provides fully for the law as regards those apprentices, and gives a power to the parishes altogether inconsistent with that conferred by the Act of Charles II.; and there is no doubt whatever that the clause in the former statute is repealed by the clause in the later one. I merely mention this incidentally, to show that each and every particular part of the Act of Charles are repealed by some subsequent law. Now, the Jamaica Acts, 4th and 5th William IV. cap. 8., contain express provisions with regard to the erection of workhouses and houses of correction, and also an admirable set of rules and regulations for the management of those places. Those rules and regulations, so far from assuming the existence of the power to whip persons, make a classification, and particularly direct that due provision shall be made in each prison for the enforcement of hard labour upon such prisoners as it shall be felt due and proper to inflict it upon; and they were followed, verbatim, in the Jamaica Prisons Act of the 1st and 2d Victoria, which also contains no provision as to whipping. I think, therefore, it is perfectly clear that there is no power under the Act cited to inflict corporal punishment; and as a proof that no such power exists, no attempt has been made to exercise it. The special justices have been appointed for the protection of the emancipated classes; and I do not find that any individual has been punished as a vagrant except in one case, where a man was sent to Montego Bay for two days and kept to hard labour, for the offence of sleeping in the open air at night,— an offence for which, if he had been brought before a police office at home, he would have been punished by a much longer confinement, with, perhaps, the addition of hard labour on the treadmill. In point of fact, how is it possible that, in Jamaica, there can be any vagrants? Vagrants are persons wandering from place to place without means or provision. Why, the emancipated population have now more means of provision than some of their masters, for they have their provision grounds to resort to; and, in many instances, instead of confining themselves to the legitimate purpose for which these provision grounds were granted, — that of raising sustenance for themselves and their families, — the negroes speculate, and grow sugar upon them on their own account. Sir, this House will be much mistaken if they suppose the negroes have no desire to avail themselves of the rights conferred upon them by emancipation, — or that they do not desire to avail themselves of the right of voting. They do, and to a very great extent; and, moreover, the white population have no objection to their exercising that right. There are, already, many persons of colour in the House of Assembly, and ere long the whole black population will have the right of voting; and the whites have no desire to deprive them of the right of being represented, and of those consequences, which, in the nature of things, must inevitably flow from that right, if you, the Imperial Parliament, do not strangle the constitution of Jamaica.

It appears to me, therefore, that there is no ground for fear,— for the law does not permit these oppressions to be exercised which the Right Honourable Gentlemen opposite apprehends. There is a provision in the second Act — that of 37 Geo. III. — which appears to strike the Right Honourable Gentleman very much. He says that, by sec. 6., it is enacted, that all white persons apprehended and committed to prison, shall be lodged separately and apart from the negroes who may also be in gaol at the same time. The Right Honourable Gentleman says this a great hardship and an abuse — that while we have abolished slavery, and determined to put the black population on an equality with the whites, we yet insult and degrade the former, by enacting that they shall be kept apart from the latter, even at a time when both are in a state of receiving punishment for offences of, probably, an identical character. Now, I can relieve the Right Honourable Gentleman from his fear on this score also; for, actually, the power to separate offenders by distinction of colour does not exist at all. By the Act of William IV. it is recited, that former Acts do not sufficiently relieve the black population from the disabilities under which they had laboured; and it enacts that from and after the passing of this Act, all the free black and brown population of this colony shall enjoy all rights and privileges; and that Act of William IV. puts an end to the clause in the Act of Geo. III., alluded to by the Right Honourable Gentleman. Accordingly, no such power of separation as he complains of exists, and nobody would dare to put it into execution. Then there comes the Abolition Act; so that, both by the law of England and Jamaica, no such power exists. Also, it is proved that no such power exists by the Prisons Act of Jamaica, with which you so unnecessarily interfered. In that Act there is a classification of prisoners of all colours — a classification without reference to any thing but the nature of the offence — in the workhouses of the colony. According to that classification, offenders of one class are to be kept together, be they white, brown, or black; and offenders of another class are to be kept together, without reference, I say, in any case, to distinction of colour. Therefore, Sir, I repeat, that, by rules established under the authority of the Imperial Parliament, the prisoners in Jamaica are not classed according to their colour, but according to the nature of their crime; and so the apprehensions of the Right Honourable Gentleman are entirely without foundation. Then, Sir, I beg also the attention of the Right Honourable Gentleman to the fact, that should even the minimum of improper or illegal punishment be inflicted, the Governor and council have power to remit it.

With regard to the law of master and servant, I will only now remark, that the planters and the negroes ought to have been allowed to fall naturally into the relation of master and servant; but the fact is, no contracts have been entered into, because the black people have been advised not to work, — and the result is, that they have yielded no continuous labour, but have fallen back on their provision grounds. If there be a necessity for legislation on this subject, it should originate in the colony. I say, then, Sir, that Honourable Gentlemen should take heed of the course they are pursuing; if they do not, they may lose to this country the great revenue she derives from the Island of Jamaica; but, on the other hand, if they proceed in a proper spirit, they may preserve that important colony as a source of wealth to the empire, and at the same time not interfere in the least with the rights of the newly emancipated population, nor fail in protecting them from injury and oppression. I say that this House has now the opportunity of doing justice to the emancipated population, without doing injustice to the House of Assembly. Sir, I do not hesitate to affirm, that this Bill, if it pass into a law, will be one of the most harsh and oppressive, and at the same time, one of the most unnecessary, enactments that ever passed this House. I pledge my reputation as a lawyer, — and it may be said that the stake is small — but, such as it is, I risk it on the issue, — that there is no enacting part of this Bill, the necessity of which can be defended on any principle of justice, on account of anything that has yet passed. I believe that the country will fairly judge between the two sides, or parties, when the question is fairly before it; and I have no doubt as to the way in which the decision will be given. If such grounds of necessity exist for this measure as have been asserted, they have not hitherto been shown; and if such proceedings as have been alleged had taken place in the prisons, they would certainly have been described in the reports of the stipendiary magistrates and the inspectors of prisons. I trust, then, that the House will give the Legislature of Jamaica an opportunity of doing that which Honourable Gentlemen opposite say they are so anxious for, — namely, of legislating for the emancipated population of that colony. If the House of Assembly reject the opportunity so afforded to it, I pledge myself to give my best support to the Government in passing such laws as may be necessary to meet the exigency of the case. Entertaining these feelings, I will conclude with moving that the first enacting clause in this Bill be omitted.

On the question being put, "That this clause stand part of the Bill,"—

Mr. LABOUCHERE said: — In the first place, Sir, I cannot but express my regret that the Right Honourable Gentleman was not present at the debate which took place when the former measure proposed by the Government was under discussion; for I feel satisfied that, if the Right Honourable Gentleman had been then present, he would not have thought it necessary to enter into the very wide field of discussion which occupied the first half of his speech, but which offered nothing but topics that were already discussed and disposed of; nor have even they been made the subject of any observations but such as were applicable to a measure which, although it was under the consideration of the House, indeed, upon that former occasion, does not form, at present, the subject of deliberation. I hope, therefore, that the House will excuse me, and that the Right Honourable Gentleman will not attribute it to any want of respect for his argument, if I abstain from following the Right Honourable Gentleman into a discussion which cannot be attended with profit on the present occasion. Instead of doing so, I think I shall better employ the time of the House if I endeavour to state what I conceive to be the real object of the present debate, — and what are the much narrower, although very important, grounds upon which the House has now to form its judgment. With regard to the former Bill brought forward by the Government, the Right Honourable Gentleman has truly said that it was withdrawn, — not because there was any change of opinion, on the part of the Administration, as to its utility, nor because the House expressed a contrary opinion to that which was announced by the Government, — but because the House was nearly equally divided in its sentiments upon the question. While one party was of opinion that the conduct of the House of Assembly had been such as could lead to no rational belief that they would legislate, hereafter, so as to give effect to the great measure of emancipation, and to satisfy the just expectations of the people of England; the other party considered it expedient — not, indeed, to succumb to the House of Assembly, — not to permit it to persist in the system which it had theretofore pursued, but — to give it (to use the phrase of the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth) a locus pœnitentiæ, — taking care, at the same time, that, if the House of Assembly did not avail itself of this locus pœnitentiæ, — if all legislation was suspended in Jamaica for another year, — sufficient provision should be made for preventing the occurrence of anything that could endanger the peace of the community in that colony, or frustrate the great experiment of which it is now the scene. The present Bill has been framed for the express purpose of carrying into effect the latter of these views of the subject, and of affording the locus pœnitentiæ which was contemplated. If it pass, the House of Assembly will be called together, and will be invited to legislate; and I should consider that the Government, after making this concession, would be acting in an unworthy spirit, if it did not afford to the House of Assembly a full and fair opportunity of legislating upon the subjects now demanding their attention, or if the present Bill contained any restrictive provision which the safety and welfare of the people of the colony did not fairly require. The only question, then, is, whether the provisions of the present Bill go any further than the necessity of the case demands? or whether it is only such a measure as is necessary to fulfil the pledge which Honourable Members have given to their constituents, that they would use their best endeavours to secure the success of the Emancipation Act, and not abdicate the control which this House possesses, at the very time when it may be most necessary to exert it? For, although slavery may be abolished, the interests of the recently emancipated population will furnish abundant cause for the Legislature of this country to continue to exercise its paternal care and solicitude towards the inhabitants of the colony. That is the real question now in debate; and I shall say nothing whatever with respect to the bygone transactions which formed the topics of the early part of the Right Honourable Gentleman's speech, except a very few words in justice to the gallant officer — Sir Lionel Smith — to whom allusion was so often made. I can easily understand the Right Honourable Gentleman's anxiety to vindicate his consistency in the present instance, after the course which he took on a former occasion. When the Emancipation Bill was before Parliament, — a Bill which invaded every right of the House of Assembly, if that body had the exclusive right to legislate for Jamaica, — a measure which interfered infinitely more with their alleged privileges than the present Bill, — I recollect the conduct pursued by the Right Honourable Gentleman; and I am, therefore, not surprised that the Right Honourable Gentleman appears so anxious to vindicate the consistency of the course he is now pursuing. What was the course that the Right Honourable Gentleman adopted on the occasion in question? That Bill was brought forward by her Majesty's Ministers; and the Right Honourable Gentleman suggested that a number of amendments should be introduced into the Emancipation Act with the view of protecting the rights and interests of the negro population. Several of these amendments were adopted on the recommendation of the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman; and, amongst others, the prison clauses were introduced into the Abolition Act Amendment Bill, with the view of meeting the feelings of alarm which were excited as to the conduct that would be pursued towards the negro population, and the thorough distrust which the planters in Jamaica had justly inspired. These clauses, I repeat, the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman successfully pressed on her Majesty's Government, and they were adopted in that measure. Does the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman now mean to say that these clauses were not then absolutely necessary? and will he say that he will not protect the emancipated negro population as well as the apprentices? Does he mean to say that a Prisons Bill is not necessary? Was it intended that, at the expiration of the Apprenticeship Act, the emancipated population should be left to such protection as would be afforded them under a Prisons Bill passed by the House of Assembly? If the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman does advocate this view of the case, he will have some difficulty in persuading the House that he has acted a consistent part. In reply to the charges made by the Right Honourable Gentleman against Sir Lionel Smith, I scarcely feel it necessary to do more than refer the House to the extracts which I read on a former occasion from the speeches of several members of the House of Assembly, who said that their quarrel was not with Sir Lionel Smith; that they were most anxious not to make it a personal quarrel with him; that their quarrel was with the Imperial Parliament and the Government of England; that their complaint was of the manner and tone in which the Imperial Parliament legislated for the Island of Jamaica, and that they wanted to be assured that that course of legislation would be altered. That was the ground, as alleged by those members of the House of Assembly, which had led to their differences with Sir Lionel Smith. The Right Honourable Gentleman has commented in severe language upon the conduct of Sir Lionel Smith towards the negroes; in answer to which I will read an extract from a proclamation issued by that gallant officer, and addressed to the negro apprentices, on the 9th of July, 1838, which is in these words: —

> Recollect what is expected of you by the people of England, who have paid such a large price for your liberty. They not only expect that you will behave yourselves as the Queen's good subjects, by obeying the laws, as I am happy to say you have always done as apprentices, but that the prosperity of the island will be increased by your willing labour, greatly beyond what it ever was in slavery. Be honest towards all men; be kind to your wives and children; spare your wives from heavy field-work as much as you can; make them attend to their duties at home, in bringing up your children, and in taking care of your stock; above all, make your children attend divine service and school. If you follow this advice, you will, under God's blessing, be happy and prosperous.

The Right Honourable Gentleman may make that proclamation a matter of crimination against Sir Lionel Smith, as being unnecessary and uncalled for; but I am of opinion that the people of England will think very differently of it, and I believe that very few Honourable Gentlemen on the other side of the House will concur in the censure passed by the Right Honourable Gentleman, or in such language as has been applied by him to the conduct of that gallant officer. I have thought it only a matter of justice to say thus much in defence of Sir Lionel Smith, — who has had, Heaven knows, sufficient difficulties to contend with, besides misrepresenations of this sort, — and to repel, as I believe I have refuted, the charges made against him. I now come to what I consider to be the real question. Both sides of the House, I believe, are agreed as to the principle; but while we (the Government) do give to the House of Assembly a locus pœnitentiæ, and time to pass every law that may be required for the prosperity of the island, — while we do not, Sir, attempt to legislate in the slightest degree directly, provided the Colonial Legislature will but legislate for themselves, — we at the same time conceive it necessary to give to the Governor and council the discretionary power of reviving such measures as the House of Assembly may refuse to re-enact. I agree with the Right Honourable Gentleman, that it would be dangerous to say, at this side of the Atlantic, what portion of these particular laws are absolutely necessary for the good government of Jamaica, and what portion are not so. I will only say, in reference to the doubt expressed by the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite of the original intention of the Government to introduce into the clause conferring the discretionary power to which he has alluded, a provision which will give to the House of Assembly full time to legislate, if they are so disposed to do, — I will only say, that both the original and printed copies of the Bill contain such provision. I may also appeal to Mr. Burge, whom I informed of the fact of the words having been accidentally omitted in the Bill. I must now briefly advert to the difference between the language used by the Right Honourable Gentleman, and that employed by Mr. Burge, when he addressed this House. The Right Honourable Gentleman objected, in very strong language, to the powers conferred upon the Governor and council in the first clause; whereas, the arguments of Mr. Burge were specially directed against the second clause in the Bill: and that I am not surprised at, when I consider that the clause in question contains a taxing power; — Mr. Burge even went so far as to say that, unless that clause was expunged, there was no chance of the Assembly of Jamaica proceeding to legislate. The Right Honourable Gentleman has told the House that any new law upon the subject of vagrancy is absolutely unnecessary. The Right Honourable Gentleman is perfectly singular in that opinion. It is not the opinion of the Governor, who says it is absolutely necessary; neither is it the opinion of the House of Assembly themselves, who agree that a Vagrancy Act is one of the measures most called for in the colony — nay, that it is absolutely imperative. All the encomiums, therefore, which the Right Honourable Gentleman has indulged in, upon the subject, go for nothing. I am greatly surprised to hear the Right Honourable Gentleman say that there is no vagrancy in Jamaica. If that be the case, how does it happen that the Governor, that the House of Assembly, and that every person who has communicated information on the subject, should have been so completely ignorant of the fact, since they all agree in saying that a good Vagrancy Law is most essentially requisite for the Island of Jamaica, in its present state? I will now proceed to consider the present law of vagrancy in the colony. I am aware that, in touching on this part of the subject, I may appear to be guilty of presumption in contending on a point of law with such an eminent authority in the legal profession as the Right Honourable Gentleman; and if I rested merely on my own opinion, I should hesitate to make any observations on the subject; but, fortunately, I am backed in the view that I take of the subject by those whom I must consider to be competent authorities on it. The Right Honourable Gentleman says that he will pledge his reputation, as a lawyer, that he 35th Charles II. c. 11. — the frightful provisions of which, on a former occasion, I read to the House — is no longer applicable in the colony, but that every clause in it has been repealed and annulled; and that it is no more the law of Jamaica now, than if it had never been enacted; and that he cannot understand how any man of reason could look at the statutes of Jamaica and not be of the same opinion. I have a very great respect for the opinion of the Right Honourable Gentleman; but I think I shall be able to show that neither has the Governor of Jamaica stated that a new law is not necessary, nor have the colonial officers adopted that statement, upon light grounds. I think I can show, likewise, that the opinion of the Chief Justice, and that of the Attorney General, of Jamaica, are entitled to some respect upon this point. If it happen that their opinions are in direct contradiction to that of the Right Honourable Gentleman, I will not say it follows that the Right Honourable Gentleman is right and they are wrong, but that there must be some obscurity on the subject, and that it is clearly the duty of this House to provide that no such obscurity shall any longer exist. I conceive that the opinion of the Chief Justice and Attorney General of Jamaica is, practically, of considerable importance on this point, because they are the persons who have practically to decide upon it. It would be rather an unfortunate kind of consolation to a person who should happen to be flogged under the Act in question, to be told that, in the opinion of a very eminent English lawyer, his punishment was illegal, for the Vagrant Act was not law. I fear the Right Honourable Gentleman has rather rashly declared that he would willingly undergo any number of lashes that could be inflicted under that Act —— and that, were the point to be put at issue, he would feel somewhat disposed to retract his offer. In a despatch, dated November 6. 1827, I find the opinions of the Chief Justice and the Attorney General upon this subject, which are to the effect that the 35th of Charles II. c. 11. gives the power of punishing vagrancy in Jamaica; that, by the 3d section, the churchwardens are authorised to apprentice poor children; that the 4th section of George III. authorises the establishment of workhouses; and the 5th, the occupation of vagrants at labour for a certain period. When we find it to be the opinion of the Governor that very serious evils may result from maintaining the present law, and not enacting a new one on the subject of vagrancy, — and when we find that the House of Assembly also requires some alteration in the law,—I think I may fairly conclude that it would be most inexpedient to allow another year to pass over without some new enactment on the subject. The Right Honourable Gentleman has stated that there is no evidence of convictions having taken place under the present Act. That is true; but it should be recollected, that hitherto ejectments have not taken place to any great extent in Jamaica. If the number of ejectments should become increased, the case would be found very different in reference to the number of convictions under the Act. At all events, it cannot be said that the House of Commons is acting intemperately in providing that there shall be legislation on the subject, when we at the same time provide that ample means and time shall be afforded the Legislative Assembly of Jamaica to legislate for themselves, before we interfere with them. The Right Honourable Gentleman has likewise observed, that even if we and the law officers of Jamaica are right in supposing that this law — or what we regard as the present Vagrancy Law— is actually in force, and unrepealed, it, after all, does not vary much from the English law. Now, I conceive they differ in many important points. If the House look at the provisions of the present vagrant laws in England, as consolidated and amended in 1824, they will find them infinitely less harsh than those of the Jamaica law. Even if they were word for word the same, still it should be recollected that a law on this subject, which might work very well in England, might work very harshly in Jamaica, where there exists, among other difficulties, such a mutual distrust between the employer and the labourer. I readily admit that, in the Orders of Council now on the table of the House, there is evinced a distrust and suspicion, but it is a necessary distrust and suspicion. I now come to the second clause of the Bill, which regulates contracts for lands, upon which the House of Assembly has come to a similar conclusion, — namely, that a new law of contracts is urgently required for Jamaica. The Right Honourable Gentleman says he does not consider any new law necessary. I, however, must own that I cannot but think the House of Assembly and the Governor of Jamaica, upon this, as upon the other point, a higher practical authority than the Right Honourable Gentleman can possibly be. If we compare the contract laws of England and Jamaica, a very great difference will be found between them. The law of contracts, as at present existing in Jamaica, is completely a one-sided law. All the penalties and punishments are directed against the negro who may break his contract; there are none on the other side. The Right Honourable Gentleman says there is no necessity for a new law, because there are very few punishments under the present. There are, undoubtedly, very few; but the reason of that is, that there are very few contracts. The negro will not enter into a contract under the present law; and I think he is quite justified in declining to do so upon such terms as the law now provides. It gives to the negro no power to recover from the oppressor — if it shall be his misfortune to fall into the hands of one — that which is his due; while it gives to the master every power of teasing and harassing the negro, if he shall think fit so to do. If you are disposed to place the negro in a just relation to the master, and if you do not wish to prevent him from acquiring habits of industry, then must you agree with the House of Assembly, that legislation on the subject is necessary.

The last law to which I have to refer, and which is by far the least important, is that for preventing the unauthorised occupation of land; an evil which has not gone to any great extent in Jamaica, because, hitherto, there have been but few ejectments: but the enactment of a proper law is essential to meet the contingency of the number of ejectments being increased; in which case the present law would operate very injuriously. I beg of the House to recollect the position in which we stand with regard to these laws. We have heard the learned agent for the House of Assembly, and I am glad we have. That gentleman did not state that any one of those laws is in itself oppressive or unjust, or is not such a law as the House of Assembly ought to pass; and I beg the House to observe that these three Orders of Council have been in operation in all the Crown colonies without giving rise to the slightest complaint against them. I will repeat, that it is the wish of her Majesty's Government to respect the feelings of the House of Assembly in Jamaica as far as possible, and as far as possible to avoid any interference with the just rights and privileges of that body; but to adopt so moderate and limited an interference as that which has been recommended from the other side, would be a complete abandonment of the position which the Ministers of the Crown took up in the last Session of Parliament. In the month of April, last year, the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman opposite contended that the Government in the West Indies should have the power of making regulations for controlling the colonial Legislatures, and for affording sufficient protection to the apprentices. His argument now goes quite the other way; he altogether objects to the Government making any new regulations: and I must remark, I am surprised to hear the Right Honourable Gentleman say that his objection to the Prisons Bill is on account of its doing that which was the purport of his own clause. I will ask, is it wise or prudent that there should be so little of consistency or stability in the conduct of public affairs as this violent departure from principles previously acknowledged and acted upon implies? At times there would appear to be, in this House, great excitement on the subject of our West India colonies, and there would appear to be an earnest disposition to agree to any propositions, however sweeping and extensive: then a change will come over the sentiment of the House;—the language held will be different, and, the public attention, being fixed on something else, we allow these colonial Assemblies to set us at defiance. Sir, I apprehend that, when this House passed the Emancipation Act, they said,—"We will not prematurely terminate the apprenticeship; but when the period of it shall have transpired, we will continue to extend our protecting care over the free black population." Then, Sir, I ask, after all the experience we have had, — after the House of Assembly has refused to legislate, — shall we leave these three subjects — admitted, by those best acquainted with the colony, urgently to require legislation — to take their chance in the hands of the Assembly? Sir, if we were to do this, our constituents would say that, on the former occasion, we adopted our resolution only in deference to the popular excitement of the time,—that we yielded to the breath of popular clamour: they will, in consequence, lose all faith for the future in such general declarations; and when next such a state of things shall arise, and we attempt to meet it by a promise of the kind, they will cease to place any reliance upon a general assurance. Sir, it is my opinion that everything should be done, and nothing omitted, to show that a protecting care will be extended to the negro population; and I urge these considerations, and all others which I have felt it to be my duty to address to the House, with the more earnestness, from a conviction that the House is now upon its trial; and I hesitate not to say that, if we do not take care, we shall altogether lose the confidence of the colonial dependencies of this great empire. There is, I repeat, no portion of the empire which can put confidence in our general declarations, if, on one occasion, we limit our provisions in legislation to an extent so narrow as is now proposed, while at another we are ready to go indefinite lengths. I hope, then, that the House will not reject the proposed clause. In framing this Bill, her Majesty's Government have been most anxious to limit the interference within the narrowest bounds to which it can safely be confined; and I claim, in their name and on their behalf, as much credit for what they leave undone, as for what they do; and when the House considers how essential is some legislation, in the altered condition of things in Jamaica, I trust they will not refuse their sanction to this measure.

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE.—Sir, for several reasons, I wish to address the House on the present occasion as briefly as possible. I feel that it has been often my lot to obtrude myself on the attention of the House on this subject; and I feel, likewise, that the whole of the legal part of the subject has already been exhausted by my Right Honourable and Learned Friend near me, the Member for Ripon, and I believe that what remains to be said may be comprised in a very few words. I always did agree in much that has fallen from the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite on the subject of the West India colonies, and especially I concur with him on the present occasion: I agree with him in thinking that, upon a subject of this nature, it is a matter of the highest importance that the colonies of this great empire should feel confidence in the steadiness and the stability of the Government. I concur with those who lay it down as a general principle, regarding the control which the Imperial possesses over the colonial Legislature, "that that control is supreme." There cannot be a shadow of doubt that Parliament has maintained and exercised that control. It is a matter not to be questioned, that it forms part of the duty of Parliament to watch over, to correct, and to control the Legislatures of our West India colonies. I agree further, that, as a general rule, it is expedient, it is prudent, it is in accordance with equity and justice, that Parliament should leave the ordinary business of legislation to the colonial Legislatures; and that Parliament —exercising a control over itself—should not permit itself to interfere or to meddle with affairs of every day occurrence, but should rather reserve itself exclusively for great and worthy occasions on which to interpose its paramount authority. If, then, the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite agrees with me in these general principles,—as, indeed, I do not see how he can dissent from them,—I beg permission to examine in what manner they can be applied to the proposition now before the House. In the first place, it cannot be denied that the colonial Assembly ought to have a full and fair opportunity to reconsider the course which they have pursued. When that opportunity has been given, and when it is found that the colonial Legislatures have not employed it to advantage, I shall then not be prepared to oppose the interference of the Imperial Parliament. But until that time arrives, I confess it does appear to me that we ought to pause. The Right Honourable Gentleman opposite has spoken as if I, and those with whom I am in the habit of acting, had treated the question before us as a party question. Can he, on reflection, really think so? In choosing a point of attack, is it to be supposed that the weaknesses of the Government are so few, or the Conservative party so much embarrassed, as to involve the necessity of coming to issue in the defence of the Jamaica House of Assembly? Can any one suppose that we should have entered upon that defence, had we not been influenced by those higher considerations which rest on the great principles of public justice? Before I proceed further, I request the House to reflect upon the probable reception which a measure of this nature would be likely to secure, if, instead of the Noble Viscount in another place, the

If that Right Honourable Gentleman had proposed to suspend the rights and privileges enjoyed by the House of Assembly in Jamaica during 200 years, not only the whole of the Honourable Members opposite would have raised against him a most formidable opposition, but more than half of his own friends would have withdrawn from him their support, and have said, that, though disposed to vote for his measures generally, "this was too much." I ask, is it to be expected that 294 Members — I believe that is the number — of the reformed Parliament would support a Bill hoping to get rid of it on principles such as have been stated?

Now, I will ask, have the colonial Legislature in Jamaica been allowed the opportunity to which they are fairly entitled? I will assert the negative. It was not in their power to have proceeded with the matter antecedently to the month of November last, for they were in effect prohibited by the policy pursued at the Colonial Office, with the details of which it is not now necessary that I should trouble the House. In November last the subject was certainly named to them by the Governor; but before that time it was out of their power to take the subject up. I will now come back to the Prisons Act. I am prepared to admit the objections to it, — nothing shall restrain me from doing so; but I request, at the same time, that Honourable Members will not lose sight of the fact, — that at the time of passing the Emancipation Act there was a contract for the fair carrying out of all principles on which that measure was founded, and there can be no doubt that there was a full understanding that an improvement in prison discipline was to be amongst the number. But by the provisions of this Bill it is proposed to legislate, as to the minutest details, for the prisons of the West Indies, in a tone and manner which would have fully authorised any other act of internal interference. Had it not been protested against by the local Legislature, the privileges of the House of Assembly would have been completely set aside, and the Prisons Act, as it stood, would have been a precedent for the most minute interference on the part of the Imperial Legislature, even to the extent of fixing the price of yams in Kingston market. I am, moreover, prepared to affirm that Parliament may very well say that they are prepared to admit the ordinary right of the House of Assembly,—to admit that, in the usual course of affairs, that House of Assembly are entitled to regulate the affairs of the colony in such manner as they may think the most fitting; but Parliament may, at the same time, intimate to the House of Assembly, that they are not competent to the task of re-organising themselves — that Parliament must reserve to itself that important undertaking: this would not be encroaching on the constitutional rights of the colonial Legislature.

Bearing these considerations in mind, I shall request the House to recollect the demand made by the colonial House of Assembly; it is this, — that they shall be guaranteed in the exercise of the ordinary rights of legislation. I admit the dilemma and the difficulty; but I blame the mode in which the executive Government now proposes to interfere with the legislative rights of the House of Assembly, and I contend that that body ought to be allowed a sufficient locus pœnitentiæ, — an advantage to which they are entitled, but of which, it appears to me, the Government, themselves, stand in more need. That of which I think the House of Commons has a right to complain is, that there exist no fixed grounds for legislation, — that there was no fair offer held out in November last, — and that ever since then, just grounds of alarm have existed in the minds of the colonial Legislature. The intention of Parliament has been to confine itself to interference, there—and there only —where it might be necessary to secure the great end of emancipation. Further, when the Right Honourable Gentleman talks of his anxiety to give the House of Assembly ample time and opportunity for considering and settling these three important questions, I would ask what is his notion of ample time and opportunity? The House is now sitting, nearly in the middle of June. Even supposing the Bill to pass by the middle of July, which is a very liberal allowance, then it reaches Jamaica by the end of August; the Governor cannot convene the House of Assembly before the beginning of September, and then they are to be told that if they do not agree to satisfactory measures before the 1st of October, certain laws will issue from the Governor superseding their legislative power. This is surely not affording them the fair and ample opportunity of which the Right Honourable Gentleman speaks so much, — nay, more, I say it is not treating the House of Assembly with common decency. Such a proceeding as this may be justified by very strong circumstances; but what has the Right Honourable Gentleman himself stated as to the probability of obtaining laws on these subjects from the House of Assembly? Mr. Burge, it is admitted, may be taken as supplying a criterion of the opinions and views of the House of Assembly, and the Right Honourable Gentleman has remarked that Mr. Burge expressed no objection to the three enactments. Now, if this gentleman has not started such objections, and is to be taken as the mouthpiece of the colonial Legislature, what reason is there for supposing that the House of Assembly is disinclined to take the desired course themselves? Whatever the Imperial Parliament do, ought to be done in such a manner as not to nullify their own Acts. The colonial Assembly should not be called upon to adopt their course of proceedings under the influence of immediate menace. The whip which has been removed from the shoulders of the black should not be suspended over theirs. It is hardly treating them with due consideration to allow them so little time; it is absurd to call upon them to legislate within so short a period. Some time ago, nothing was thought of the delay of a year, and a year has already passed away; but there will be no such necessity for the delay of another year. What is the subject of difference? On the one hand, the Government demands that the House shall violate a great constitutional principle; and, on the other, the only inconvenience, they themselves state, is the delay of a year. But there is every reason to believe that enactments, to answer the purposes required, could become law by January next; and it would be far better, if the necessity were to arise, to summon a Parliament at an earlier period than usual to legislate upon these subjects, than that constitutional principles should be violated by providing for them in the manner proposed by this Bill. There is no reason, if the motion of my Right Honourable Friend be carried, and the first clause altogether omitted, why the Bills which it is thought desirable to enact conditionally, at the present moment, may not, after all, become law in the Island of Jamaica in January next; and the delay which will be occasioned will be much more fairly stated at three than at twelve months. What is the amount of evil which will result from this suspense? The House must certainly be surprised to learn that the negro population, whose grievances are made the foundation of this important measure, are a minority of the whole emancipated negroes. There are, at least, between 200,000 and 300,000 emancipated negroes in Barbadoes and the other islands for whom none of these provisions are proposed to be made, and yet, with respect to them, the necessity for such protection must have been just as great as for the negroes of Jamaica. If, therefore, the Government can make out a case of serious grievance for the population of Jamaica, they will convict themselves of gross neglect and injustice to the negro population of the other colonies, inasmuch as they do not propose similar regulations for them. But because they do not propose any such enactment for the other colonies, I think the inference irresistible, that there is no real case of grievance in Jamaica.

With regard to the subject of ejectments, which has been touched upon, I think the planter has more reason to complain than the negro. The planter ought to have some means of ejectment by summary process, seeing that the negro can, by summary process, recover his wages. But this defect in the law, in so far as it presses upon the planter, it is not proposed to remove. So, with respect to the law of contracts, the planter is a greater sufferer from the want of such a law than the negro. There are no means of summary ejectment. There are no written contracts in existence. But who suffers from this? Not the negro, who receives his wages from day to day; but the planter, whose interests require continuous labour on a large scale, but who cannot have it on any guarantee for its continuance under the present system. My Right Honourable Friend has referred to the Act of Charles II., relating to vagrancy; and, upon the question as to whether it has been repealed or not, he quoted the opinions of the Chief Justice and Attorney General of Jamaica, in opposition to the opinion of my Right Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Ripon. I certainly was surprised to hear my Right Honourable Friend do this, and cannot help suspecting that, if the opinions on both sides had been the reverse of what they are, my Right Honourable Friend would have quoted that of the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman the Member for Ripon as decisive authority. But I have another opinion to adduce on this subject, which, though it can give no additional weight to my Right Honourable and Learned Friend's authority, may have some influence with my Right Honourable Friend opposite. This is, the opinion of Lord Glenelg, who, in a letter of the 15th of September, 1838, to the Governor of Jamaica, says, —

The Chief Justice refers to the Colonial Act,

Chas. II. c. 18.; the Attorney General adds a reference to the 35th of Chas. II. c. 11., and the 7th of Geo. IV. c. 26. It seems to have escaped their notice, that the Acts of Chas. II. were repealed by the 6th of Geo. IV. c. 17.; nor has either of them referred to the statute of 17 Geo. III. c. 31.

It is no affair of mine, tantas componere lites. I do not say that the opinion of Lord Glenelg should overthrow that of the law officers of Jamaica; but if there be any doubt of a law 200 years old being repealed, it would be infinitely better to introduce a clause removing all difficulty, than to make such doubt a pretext for interfering with the general powers of the Legislative Assembly. The second clause involves no decision between the respective merits of the Assembly and the Government; and the only choice it offers is between superseding constitutional principles and absolute anarchy. In October next, the taxes will cease to be due, and it is essential that we should interpose to secure the first necessity of civil society. By this clause, the Imperial Legislature recognises it, as its first duty, to make provision that the Government shall be carried on, and that the population of the country shall not suffer from the suspension of the natural and necessary operations of society. Deeming it, therefore, the first duty of the Legislature to take care that the mass of the public do not suffer from the suspension of all the ordinary functions of Government, I shall support that clause with some modification. I have nothing more to add. I do not wish to detain the House. The side of the question which I advocate is not that which admits of popular appeal; but I believe it is the side which involves the principles, in the long run, most essential to the interests of the people themselves, and it is entitled to the respect which this House always accords to constitutional rights: and I must say that, if that respect exists now with the powers with which it ought to operate, it will be impossible for the House to sanction this clause of the Bill before them.

SIR GEORGE GREY.—Sir, I am not disposed to trouble the House at any length, having already so often addressed them on the subject of Jamaica; but I cannot refrain from alluding to what I might almost call the misrepresentations of the Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down, relative to the repeal of the Vagrant Act, and the despatch of Lord Glenelg. Lord Glenelg directed a circular to the officers of the different colonies, requiring information on many points bearing on the future condition of the emancipated population. He obtained full and ample reports from the different law officers upon the point of poor laws. The chief portion referred to the Colonial Act of Charles II.,—not the 35th, chap. 11., but 35 C. II., chap. 18. The Attorney General added the reference to the 35th, chap. 11.; but the unimportance of the reference was evident from the Chief Justice not adverting to it. And this was the Act which, as it referred to the poor, was repealed by the 6th of George IV. But to the query as to what were the laws existing with respect to vagrancy, the Chief Justice and the Attorney General, with one mind and without the slightest difference of opinion, referred to the two statutes, the 35th of Charles II. and the 32d of George III. Now, since it is by the Chief Justice that juries are to be directed, and the law is to be laid down and enforced in Jamaica, his opinion was of great importance as to the Act of Charles II. being still in force. No one is more ready to admit, than I, the high authority of the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman opposite; but, unless his chivalrous feelings impel him to take upon his shoulders the duties of the Chief Justice, as well as the stripes which he doubts the legality of inflicting, I cannot surrender the opinion of the law officers of Jamaica even to that of the Right Honourable Member for Ripon.

Sir, it should be remembered that the agent for Jamaica, when at the bar of this House, addressed his opposition, not to the first but the second clause; and said that, if the House passed that second clause, the Assembly could not recede from the position they had taken. It was said that no opportunity had been given to the Assembly for really considering these subjects. But I must say, that, if no opportunity has been afforded, it is because the Assembly took a ground which was untenable, and which rendered it necessary for the Governor to suspend all further communications with them until something was done by the interference of the Imperial Parliament to insure a satisfactory result. My Honourable Friend has insisted that there will not be time, if this Bill be passed, to allow the Assembly a fair opportunity for legislating on these subjects. But the words in italics may be altered, so as to give them that opportunity. Now, if this Bill pass by the 1st of July, or even so as to be transmitted to Jamaica by the packet of the 15th, there will be at least an interval of six weeks after its arrival before the measures come into operation. At all events, it is intended that such time should be given as will fully redeem the pledge given by the Government. I do not wish further to detain the House, — the main subject having already been more than fully discussed. I do, however, hope that the House, after the solemn pledge given last year, will arm the Government with sufficient powers to prevent the continuance of oppression, and to provide against the contumacy of the Assembly, in refusing to legislate, when legislation is absolutely necessary for the safety and wellbeing of the colony.

Mr. W. E. GLADSTONE. — I admit that I made a hasty and erroneous reference. But still I contend that that does not at all affect the argument. If my Right Honourable and Learned Friend be correct in saying the Act of Charles II. is repealed, cadit quæstio; if not, it would be better to insert a clause to remove all doubts, rather than invade the constitution and insult the Assembly.

[Loud cries of "Divide!" and, "Withdraw!"]

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — I am one of those who will not draw on the opinion of the Chief Justice or of the Attorney General of Jamaica. I desire to grapple with the argument of the Right Honourable and Learned Member for Ripon, and I say that I do not believe that the Act of Charles II. is repealed. First, I must observe that it is a difficult matter for the Colonial Secretary to decide that the Chief Justice or Attorney General of Jamaica has given an erroneous opinion upon such a point. But I now come to the more onerous question, and will state to the committee why I do not believe that the clause in question of the Act of Charles II. has been repealed.

I do trust the committee will give me their attention, when they consider that it is on the accuracy of this distinction that the whole question turns. Now, the 7th of Charles II., section 2., enacts, "That all rogues, vagabonds, or disorderly persons shall be apprehended by the constable, and carried before the justice of the peace; and if it shall appear that they come under that character, and refuse to work, the said justice shall order him or her to be whipped on the naked back, not exceeding 39 lashes." The Right Honourable and Learned Member is aware that one class of vagrancy cases that is to be guarded against is, that of persons who go about practising magic, or obeah as it is called; but the second statute refers only to persons who go about the country destitute, and who are not able to maintain themselves. There can be no doubt that those who practise magic are still liable to punishment under the original vagrant law, and yet the Right Honourable and Learned Member holds that the subsequent Act repeals the former. I believe that the class of cases which I have put is not touched by the second Act, because no person who is enabled to maintain himself can be said to come within the scope of that Act.

Mr. GOULBURN. — As I have not the honour to belong to the legal profession, I will not venture to give an opinion on a point of law on which two such eminent lawyers, as my Right Honourable Friend the Member for Ripon and the Honourable and Learned Gentleman opposite, differ. Still, if I were compelled to side with one or the other of them, I should be inclined, without meaning any disrespect to the Solicitor General, to stand by the opinion of my Right Honourable and Learned Friend near me, who has delivered a most able and elaborate argument, and quoted several statutes in support of his views. I must, however, deny that we are to be governed by the views of the Chief Justice of Jamaica upon a question of this nature. If that learned judge had been called on to give an opinion upon a point of form relating to the practice of his own court, I should be prepared to pay every deference to that opinion. But that is not the case here. He was called upon to state what laws were applicable to vagrancy in Jamaica, and he replies that the Acts of Charles II. and George III. are applicable; but he gives no kind of reason in support of the opinion he so entertains. Then we are told that the Chief Justice of Jamaica must necessarily be a man of great legal knowledge, and that therefore his opinion is entitled to respect. Now, how stands the fact of his knowledge?—We find, by the statement of the Right Honourable the Judge Advocate (Sir G. Grey), that the Chief Justice informed Lord Glenelg that certain Acts relating to the poor were still in force, although those Acts had really been long before repealed; consequently, the Chief Justice was clearly at fault in that case. Knowing, then, that my Right Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Ripon is as competent to judge of an Act of Parliament as any man in this country, or in any of our colonies, I take his opinion upon such a point as that now in dispute in preference to any other. But, after all, the question is very immaterial, whether the Act of Charles II. be repealed, or not. The real question is, ought this Bill to pass, or ought it not? The former Bill, which proposed to abolish the constitution of Jamaica altogether, the Government have withdrawn. But let me ask, does not this Bill do the same thing, and in a more obnoxious manner than the other? The House is aware that the present mode of passing laws in Jamaica is by a House of Assembly elected by the people, a legislative council, and a Governor; the legislative council being also the Privy Council, appointed by the Governor, and removeable at any time by the Crown. Now, what does this Bill propose? That if the House of Assembly do not agree with the legislative council as to the laws that may be brought before them,— however frivolous and unimportant may be the objection of the council, — from that time the functions of the House of Assembly shall cease, and the council shall have the power to legislate for the island. You thus, in point of fact, give a premium to the council to dispute those laws that may be submitted by the Assembly, however wholesome and salutary, in order that they may have the right of exclusive legislation. Put a similar case in regard to this country;— can any man doubt what would be the result, if it were proposed that the House of Lords should have the power of rejecting any measures that might be sent up to them from the House of Commons, to supersede the functions of the House of Commons altogether, and to legislate for the country without their interference? And yet this is the proposition brought forward by the Government with regard to Jamaica; for it makes the existence of the House of Assembly depend, not on any great public question, nor on any great point of public policy, but on any objection that may be taken to it, even from caprice, by a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature of Jamaica. I trust that this House will not give its assent to such a measure, and that it will not lend itself to destroy the only free part of the constitution of Jamaica.

Mr. SHEIL. — I think the question between both parties reduces itself to this, — is it necessary to do more than pass the second clause? What is admitted by the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman to whom the opposition is intrusted by the party to which he belongs? That Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman admits that the second clause is indispensable — that some interposition with the House of Assembly is absolutely necessary. That, then, being conceded by the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman, let us see to what results that concession must lead. The Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman, by admitting the necessity for the second clause, confesses that interference on the part of the Imperial Parliament is indispensable. Then the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman says that old laws must be revived; and he has also condemned the conduct of the House of Assembly. In commenting upon that conduct, he has pronounced an unequivocal censure. Now, if the second clause be necessary, it is worth while to ask if the first clause be not equally necessary? The case made is, that old laws must be revived, but that new laws are not necessary. How is that point to be decided by the House? We have, to be sure, heard the opinion of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman. That opinion would be entitled to the greatest respect if it were pronounced from the bench. But such is not the case, for the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman appears here in his ultra-forensic capacity. When the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman does not appear as a judge, but when he appears — he will excuse me for saying so — as a partisan, I am not disposed to attach that importance to the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman's opinion on matters, which, in another and a better place ——

I should be disposed at once to concede to them. I have marked in one respect the conduct of the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman, who began his speech at five o'clock by a denunciation of the Prisons Bill. When I heard the Prisons Bill denounced by the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman, I could not help asking myself what course the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman had taken upon the Prisons Bill. He has, indeed, this night, said that it infringed on the rights of the Assembly, and that it was an invasion of the principles upon which the colonial Assembly rests and is founded. Did the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman oppose the Prisons Bill at the time that it was proposed? Was not that Bill stronger, far, in its interference with the colony, than any measure that is now before the House? And was it not passed, not only without objection, but almost without a comment, in either House of Parliament? Mr. Burge, the agent of the House of Assembly, protested against it. He laid his protest on the table of this and of the other House of Parliament. Still, not one word was uttered against that Bill which invaded the rights of the colonial Legislature far beyond anything that has since been proposed by the Government in either House of Parliament! If, then, you did not object to the Prisons Bill, what is the reason that you now object to a Bill founded upon the same principle on which the Prisons Bill rested? But the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman has put the whole of the case upon the second clause; — he admits its necessity. He says that it is indispensable to revive old laws that are on the point of expiration, because the colony requires it.

SIR EDWARD SUGDEN. — No!

Mr. SHELL. — The Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman says "No." Why, the second clause is admitted with some modifications. You admit that old laws, which are on the point of expiring, are to be revived if the Assembly agree to revive them. This, at least, is conceded. Then, if you admit this, cannot you conceive that the enactment of new laws to meet a new state of things may also be necessary. The cardinal point — the hinge upon which the whole case turns — is this; — are new laws required? And here I must do the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman the justice to admit that he said, "Prove to me that the Bills referred to in the first clause are required, and I will at once accede to the clause." But how is that to be decided? How are we to determine whether those laws are necessary, or not? Why, by an appeal to the proceedings of the House of Assembly itself. The Assembly has distinctly, and solemnly, and unequivocably declared that Bills are required to determine between masters and servants upon the subject of the Vagrant Act; and other measures, too, are referred to in this Bill, which the Government have brought in. The Assembly, then, have admitted that new laws are required, and upon that admission the whole case of the necessity of interference by Act of Parliament rests. Will the House permit me to read the words of the House of Assembly? They say, "We feel, in common with your Excellency, the emergency in which the country is placed by the expiration of the annual laws, and are well aware of the necessity which the present state of society imposes, of laws for the prevention of vagrancy, for the regulation of the relative duties of servants and masters, to determine the qualification of electors, to regulate the militia, and to prevent the occupation of lands, — being enacted." The House, then, will be aware — which at present they do not seem to be — that the Jamaica House of Assembly has declared that those Acts which are mentioned in the first clause of this Bill are required to be enacted. I would ask, then, if the opinion of the House of Assembly, itself, is not to be preferred to the judgment of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman who opposes this clause? Under these circumstances, I think the House must perceive that it would neglect its duty if it did not pass this Bill, or some Bill of the same kind.

The committee then divided: — Ayes 228; Noes 194; — Majority 34.

Clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

The remaining clauses of the Bill, and the preamble, were then severally put, and agreed to; the House resumed; Bill to be reported to-morrow.

SUPREME COURTS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Upon the motion of Mr. FOX MAULE, — Order for the further consideration of Report, read.

Upon the question being proposed, "That the amendments made by the committee to the Bill be now read a second time," —

Mr. WALLACE said: — I intend, Sir, to take the sense of the House against the further proceeding with this Bill. I am aware that it has been debated during its previous stages; but it is equally true that it has met with great disapprobation throughout the whole of Scotland, especially as regards the proposed increase in the salaries of the judges. I am aware that any statement I might offer at this late hour of the night would receive but little attention; I, therefore, conceive that I am best performing my duty by at once moving, as an amendment, "To leave out from the words 'That the' to the end of the question, in order to add the words 'Report be taken into further consideration upon this day six months,' instead thereof."

Question proposed, —"That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question."

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I cannot suppose that the Honourable Member really intends to take the sense of the House upon his amendment, but I infer that he has proposed it merely as a sort of salvo to his conscience. I can see no difficulty that the House can have, after the very full consideration which has been given to the Bill in committee, in receiving this Report; and I have no doubt that, if the Honourable Member persist in calling for a division, he will stand alone.

Mr. WALLACE. — I fear that I shall not have all that support which I think I have a right to expect; therefore, I will not trouble the House with a division on this occasion. I shall, however, most certainly divide against the third reading.

The amendment was then, by leave, withdrawn; main question put, and agreed to: amendments read a second time, and agreed to; clause added; amendments made; Bill to be read a third time on Friday; Bill, as amended, to be printed.

METROPOLIS POLICE BILL.

On the motion of Mr. FOX MAULE, — the Order of the Day for committee, read.

On the question being put, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair," —

COLONEL SIBTHORP said: — I thought it was understood that this very objectionable Bill was not to be brought forward at a late hour of the evening.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — It is proposed to strike out all those clauses which have reference to the city police.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — This Bill is, from beginning to end, a Ministerial trick. The Noble Lord intended to take the whole arrangement and patronage of the country into his own hands; but he has found a fatal difficulty with regard to the city of London. The Honourable Baronet opposite said to the Noble Lord, "If you do this, you will lose a certain number of votes, and you must take the consequence." This was quite enough for the Noble Lord; he knew the weakness of his Government, and he was obliged to succumb. He thought it better to lose a part of the patronage, than the whole; and, accordingly, those clauses which relate to the city of London are now to be abandoned. Sir, it is my intention to move, if this Bill proceeds, that the pay of that efficient body, the metropolitan police, be increased, and that proportionate reductions be made in the salaries of that most inefficient body, her Majesty's Government. But the motion I shall now make is, "That the House resolve itself into committee on this Bill on this day six months," and upon that question I shall take a division.

The SPEAKER. — Who seconds the amendment?

The amendment not being seconded, the original question was put, and agreed to. House resolved itself into committee.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I think it right to observe that the first ten clauses of the Bill have reference entirely to that portion of the police who are under the control, not of the Metropolitan Police Commissioners, but of the body who have the controlling power over the police of the city of London. This part of the measure having been considered by a committee of the House, I am happy to say that the Members forming that committee, although of all shades of politics, have come almost to a unanimous decision in favour of the opinion which has been so strongly expressed, that the control over the police, in the city of London, ought to be left in the hands of those who now exercise that power. They are convinced that a good and efficient police would be kept up under their superintendence. I shall, therefore, now move that, with the exception of the enacting words of the first clause, the clauses from 1. to 10. inclusive be struck out.

Upon the question being put,—

COLONEL SIBTHORP said: — Although I had not the honour to obtain a seconder to my amendment, I may be allowed to ask the Honourable Gentleman for some reason why these ten clauses should, at one swoop, be thus omitted from the Bill. I know of none; unless it be that the Government are compelled to give up a part of their patronage, to prevent their losing the whole. I think, considering the duties of the metropolitan police force, that they are exceedingly ill paid; and at some future stage of the Bill I shall call the attention of the House to that part of the subject.

COLONEL WOOD. — I beg to remind the Noble Lord that the constables of Westminster at present derive a great part of their powers under the 42d George III. Now, as this Bill will altogether annihilate that species of force, I would suggest that a clause should be introduced to empower the police constables to do all those acts which the Westminster constables are required to perform.

Clauses 1. to 10. were then struck out.

Clause 11. As to extension of districts in which the Bill shall be applied.

On this clause being proposed,—

COLONEL WOOD said: — I do not see why there should be a greater power given in this Bill than that contained in the present Police Act. There are many parishes near London, which will now come within the operation of this measure, that are not included within the limits of the present Police Act.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I am sure that the power which this Bill gives, in this respect, will be most acceptable to those parishes which may be affected by it; and I believe I am correct when I say, that it is only because facilities for that purpose did not present themselves at the time, that those parishes were not included in the existing Act.

Mr. GOULBURN. — The object now is, to extend the limit from 12 to 15 miles; that is, in point of fact, to introduce a rural police in those parishes which are within 15 miles of London. Then, again, by confining the limit to exactly 15 miles, you will charge parishes with the expense of this police, which will derive little or no benefit from it.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I think it will be found that this extension of the limit will be of great advantage to the rural districts near London.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL. — That argument would be good to extend the police throughout the whole of England. In that case we had better establish a rural police at once.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — It appears to be supposed that the limit of the present police district is 12 miles from some point in the metropolis. Now, as I understand the matter, the limit is this; — that the whole of any parish, any part of which is within 12 miles from that given point, may be included. The Act says that, "Whereas it may be necessary to extend this law to other places; it shall be lawful for his Majesty, with the consent of the Privy Council, to order any parish in Middlesex, Essex, Kent, or Surrey, any part of which may be within 12 miles from Charing Cross, to be included within the operation of this Act." But the present clause does not enable you to include the whole of a parish, a part of which may be within 15 miles from the metropolis; but you confine your limits, in all cases, to a circuit of 15 miles. This is very different from the existing Act; and the consequence would be, that you would have to levy a police rate in that part of a parish which was within the 15 miles, to which some other portion of it, that was beyond that distance, would not be liable. Thus the different parts of the same parish would be subject to distinct police rates.

COLONEL WOOD.—I hope this matter will be taken into careful consideration. If the limit be extended, I hope the principle of the present Act will be adhered to; that is, that any parish, a part of which may be within the 15 miles, shall be wholly included in the police district. If this Bill were to pass in its present shape, the effect would be to cut every parish situated at the further end of the limit into two: one portion would be within the police regulations of the metropolis; while the other would be under the local jurisdiction, and subject to separate rating.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — It is possible that there might be some inconvenience in such a case as that stated by the Honourable and Gallant Member. I can imagine that, where one part of a parish is within 11 or 12 miles, and another portion of it 16 or 18 from the metropolis, it might not be convenient to divide it for the purpose of bringing one portion of it within the jurisdiction of the police commissioners. I shall have no objection to take this matter into consideration.

Clause accordingly postponed.

Clauses 12. to 20. were then severally put, and agreed to, with verbal amendments.

On clause 21. being proposed, —

Mr. BROTHERTON said: — I now move, Sir, that you do report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Question put, and agreed to. House resumed; Chairman reported progress; committee to sit again on Thursday.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL'S CIRCULAR.

The DUKE of BEAUFORT. — I am anxious to receive some information with regard to a circular letter that has been lately addressed by the Secretary of State for the Home Department to the lords lieutenants of certain counties, on the subject of allowing individuals to arm for the protection of property. It appears to me that the meaning of that letter is very imperfectly understood in the country; and that some explanation with reference to it is necessary. Your Lordships are probably aware that a communication has been made by a body denominating themselves "The Salford Radical Association," to the lord lieutenant of the county, calling on him to supply them with 1200 stand of arms, in consequence of the circular to which I have alluded. An application of the same nature has also been made from Bath, stating that "certain householders, having volunteered their services for the protection of life and property, request to be furnished with arms." I have, myself, received several letters from persons who wish to arm in this manner; but I answered, Do not do anything of the kind, because, in my opinion, nothing can be worse than for bodies of men to enrol and to arm themselves, without being placed under any regular military control. Such associations are, I am convinced, calculated to do more mischief than good. I have no doubt that it never was the intention of Government to encourage assemblies of this kind; but it would seem, from these applications, that the intention of Government is misunderstood. This sort of meetings of individuals for the protection of life and property may become very dangerous, unless they be placed under efficient military control.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I entirely agree in the general principle laid down by the Noble Duke, that it is not proper or expedient for any body of men to assemble and arm themselves, unless under the control of some person bearing her Majesty's commission. But there may be occasions, when the danger is so great, and the necessity of providing against it so immediate, as to render a departure from that principle indispensable. With respect to the case referred to by the Noble Duke, my Noble Friend the Secretary for the Home Department, in consequence of the menacing appearance which many parts of the country assumed, deemed it necessary to transmit a circular to the lords lieutenants of certain counties where the danger seemed to be most threatening, and where the greatest apprehension prevailed. In that circular, the lords lieutenants were allowed, on their responsibility, to accept the services of any body of men whom they might think proper to be employed for the preservation of the public peace, and who, they conceived, might be intrusted with arms. Reliance was placed on their prudence in ascertaining the respectability and general good conduct of those who might be so employed. To that extent, only, did the circular of my Noble Friend go. I trust that it will not be necessary to act on it to a greater extent than it has already been acted on, and that it will not be drawn into precedent beyond the immediate occasion.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON.—I am not one of those lords lieutenants to whom the circular in question has been addressed; but I should be glad to see it, as well as any instructions which may have been issued at the same time, in order to render it efficient. Two or three things strike me on this subject, on which I wish to ask a question. I am anxious to know whether or not the Noble Viscount has adverted to the powers given to magistrates by certain Acts of the late King's reign, authorising them to swear in special constables,—whether that is the class of persons whom it is the intention of the Government to arm under the instructions given by the Secretary of State? If that be the case, I cannot understand it. I shall now ask another question. I understand that, under the Act for regulating corporations, which was passed in 1835, and was much discussed in this House, powers are given to those corporations to form a police; they are enabled to raise funds to maintain that police; and the Act to which I refer also empowers them, if necessary, to raise a body of men to keep watch and ward. Now, I wish to know whether these are the people intended to be armed, under the circular, as a constitutional safeguard? I would have your Lordships recollect that, in all corporate towns, there is a great deal of party spirit. Now, suppose that the mayor of Bath were to take it into his head to arm, in the present year, a body of men of one political opinion, and that, next year, another mayor, of another opinion, and of a different party, should arm another body; what would be the consequence? These are points worthy of consideration. I should be glad, therefore, if the Noble Viscount would allow the House to see the papers and circulars connected with the subject, in order to know what instructions lords lieutenants have been directed to give to magistrates for the purpose of carrying into effect the intentions of the Secretary of State.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE.—I have no objection to lay upon the table the instructions that have been issued to the lords lieutenants and sheriffs of counties on the subject. As to the questions of the Noble Duke, I have no hesitation in stating that it is not the intention of the Government that the parties to whom allusion has been made should be armed. At the same time, I think it is in the power of the magistrates or the town councils to arm the inhabitants in certain cases. Unquestionably the intention of my Noble Friend (the Secretary of State) was, to permit the formation of armed associations for the protection of life and property; and that permission has been given to them, subject to the control, and under the instructions, of the deputy lieutenants and magistrates.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON.—If the mayors of boroughs authorise the arming of any bodies of men, they are responsible, not to the corporation, but to the law, for their acts. In the present case, however, no party is responsible: the present mayor of Bath may be a Chartist, and arm 1000 men; and in November next another mayor, of different politics, may place 1000 men of different political opinions under arms. Such a state of things can only be productive of the greatest mischief to life and property.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—I understand that two circulars have been issued: under one circular, arms were to be supplied to persons for the protection of property; whilst, under the other, the magistrates were directed to prevent persons from assembling for the purpose of military exercise. Now, it happens that, under the first circular, certain persons did procure arms, and proceeded to train themselves in their use; but those very parties who took arms under the first circular, were informed against, under the second, were arrested, and were called on to find bail. So much for the uniformity of the system!

LORD PORTMAN. — I beg to trouble your Lordships with one observation, in consequence of what has fallen from the Noble Duke (the Duke of Wellington). I can assure my Noble Friend that no disposition exists in Bath to take any improper advantage of the power granted by the circular. If any such disposition should appear, I need only tell the Noble Duke that the magistrates would keep a good look out, and speedily put an end to it.

BEER ACT IN PART REPEAL BILL.

The amendment in this Bill having been reported, —

LORD BROUGHAM said: — As a Noble Friend of mine (the Marquess of Salisbury), who takes a deep interest in this Bill, is now absent from town, and will be so for some days, unwillingly, I am compelled to postpone the third reading until Monday next.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — With reference to the Bill, I have no doubt that the Noble and Learned Lord has very good reasons for postponing it; but, at the same time, it should be recollected that the Bill has been, now, for several weeks on the table of the House, and it is most desirable that your Lordships should come to some opinion respecting it.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I can positively assure the Noble Lord that I have not contracted any of the disease of dilatoriness which infects certain constitutions, and there is not the remotest chance of my Bill being postponed — not till the year 1842, but — beyond Monday next. I do not introduce measures with the intention that they should not pass, but with the intention that they should pass.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I think it would be better if the dilatory system to which the Noble and Learned Lord adverts, were extended to the Beer Bill also. Considering the immense amount of property affected by the measure, I think the House would pursue a very hasty course in passing it without the utmost deliberation.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I differ with my Noble Friend; for, although I think it is very proper that bad Bills, when brought in, should be put off as long as possible, yet I do not think that my Beer Bill, which is not of that character, should be put off to the Greek Kalends, or — to what is now the same thing — the year 1842. My Noble Friend has talked of capital invested in these beer-shops. Why, it is stated, in the Report of the commissioners on the subject, that many of them are kept by paupers, who scarcely possess more furniture than a table, a chair, and a few broken jugs, in which they dole out their liquor. It is ridiculous to talk of the immense property involved in the consideration of the Bill. Though I am not friendly to frequent or long postponements, still, as my measure does not compromise the good government of a whole province, I think I may safely put it off till Monday.

The MARQUESS of WESTMINSTER. — As my Noble and Learned Friend has postponed the third reading of the Bill until Monday, this certainly is not the proper time to enter into any discussion. I did not mean to say one word upon the subject; but in consequence of what has just fallen from the Noble and Learned Lord, I beg confidently to state, that, generally speaking, the capital invested in a beer-shop amounts to something like 300*l*.

LORD BROUGHAM. — Then the Noble Marquess's beer-house must be of a superior description.

EARL STANHOPE. — I beg to ask if the Noble and Learned Lord would have any objection to refer the Bill to a select committee to hear evidence, before he proceeds to confiscate a large amount of property, and ruin numbers of unoffending individuals? As to the Report alluded to by my Noble and Learned Friend, it contains statements which are both false and incredible.

LORD BROUGHAM. — Why, when the Bill was referred to a select committee, did not the Noble Earl attend to make his objection? Why did he not do so when it was before a committee of the whole House? But, no; now, on the third reading, the Noble Earl wants to have witnesses called and evidence received. Why, if your Lordships sanctioned hearing evidence in this stage of a Bill, you never could get through any business. I believe that the excitement of the Noble Earl is not so much elicited by the Report which he has attacked, as by the name which is attached to it,—the name of Lefevre,—the name of the Speaker of the House of Commons.

EARL STANHOPE.—To assail the interests or the character of any class of our fellow citizens without hearing them, is to commit the grossest injustice. The matter of this Report, I will affirm, is not only false, but notoriously false.

LORD BROUGHAM.—The Noble Earl makes a most serious charge against the Speaker of the House of Commons, and two other gentlemen, who have merely stated what they firmly and conscientiously believe, with as much truth and sincerity as the Noble Earl, or any other Noble Lord, could possibly feel.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—I think that the Noble and Learned Lord, if he had read the Report, would have been of opinion, as all who have read it have hitherto been, that it contains a vast quantity of valuable information. The great objection I have to the Report is its intolerable length. It is too voluminous to be read generally by the public.

EARL STANHOPE.—I did not pretend to give an opinion upon the Report without reading it; but, having carefully perused it, I will venture to assert that it states much which is false.

The EARL of RADNOR.—The Noble Earl has said that gentlemen have put their names to a Report which is notoriously false. It is impossible for the Noble Earl to affirm that the statements of the Report are notoriously false. I should say that those statements are notoriously true, so far as my experience goes.

EARL STANHOPE.—Some isolated facts may be true; but, as a general Report, I maintain that the inferences are notoriously false.

The EARL of FALMOUTH.—I certainly do not think your Lordships are inclined to pass a measure which would inflict much injustice, without affording the parties the opportunity of opposing it. The publicans have been sacrificed by hundreds, because it was said the Beer Bill was for the good of the country. I firmly believe that there never was a more pernicious Act of Parliament passed than that Beer Bill. Much of the bad spirit which now prevails in the country originates in the beer-shops. Will your Lordships reject the alteration required, because the Noble Earl (Earl Stanhope) happens to think that a select committee is necessary? I hope another Parliament will not be allowed to pass over without your Lordships finding a remedy for this monstrous grievance.

The EARL of MALMESBURY.—I am certain that Colonel Rowan would not attach his name to any document which he did not believe to be perfectly correct. He is a distinguished officer in her Majesty's service, and has discharged his duties with the greatest credit to himself, and, consequently, with benefit to the public. Really, the Noble Earl has no right to attack gentlemen of respectability in the manner he has done.

EARL STANHOPE.—I am perfectly aware that the Report is signed by Colonel Rowan, amongst others. I have no doubt that certain facts stated in the Report are true, but general inferences are deduced from particular facts,—which I again aver are false.

The MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE.—I think it but due to my Noble Friend the Secretary of the Home Department, that I should state, what I know to be the fact,—that he made the best selection of persons he could, to carry on the inquiry; and I do not think that Noble Lord could have found three persons more fitted for the purpose, from their talents, acquaintance with facts, and unquestionable integrity. It is true that these commissioners have had reference only to particular facts in drawing inferences as to generals; but those particular facts were collected from various parts of the country, from various classes, and referring to different periods of time. I will only say that the highly respectable individuals selected to make the Report have discharged their duty satisfactorily to the Government, and, I trust, satisfactorily to Parliament.

The Bill was then ordered to be ingrossed, and to be read a third time on Monday next, and the Lords summoned.

journment of yesterday, when the Chairman received a letter from Edward Protheroe, Esquire (one of the members of the committee), informing the committee that he was disabled by a serious accident from attending, and that the committee then adjourned till to-morrow morning, at eleven o'clock.

Mr. Johnson, a medical man, was called in, and stated that Mr. Protheroe was disabled by a serious accident from attendance on the committee; and then he withdrew. Mr. Protheroe excused for non-attendance this day, and discharged from further attendance on the committee.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. SPEAKER. — Perhaps it may be convenient to the House to state that I will take the chair at three o'clock to-morrow, for the purpose of receiving public petitions.

Mr. P. THOMSON. — Perhaps the Honourable Member, who has charge of the motion respecting Haytian coffee, will forego it pending negotiations now in progress on the subject.

Mr. THORNELY. — I consent to waive the motion which stands for to-night relative to the duty on Haytian coffee, upon the assurance of my Right Honourable Friend that negotiations are in progress.

Mr. WARD. — Sir, as the motion of the Honourable Member for London, with regard to the ballot, stands for Tuesday next, I will beg to postpone my motion on colonial lands, which stood for the same day, till this day fortnight.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I hope that the Honourable Member for Southwark will, on the same grounds, postpone his motion respecting the administration of public charities.

Mr. HARVEY. — Perhaps I am not convinced that making the ballot an open question is of so much importance as the introduction of a Bill respecting the administration of public charities; but the one question is of so interesting, and the other of so dry a nature, that I despair of obtaining the attention of the House on the same day, and shall therefore defer my motion.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS. — On behalf of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, I beg leave to postpone his motion respecting the Bank of England till this day three weeks.

Mr VILLIERS. — I also beg leave to postpone my motion regarding the timber duties from Thursday, the 20th instant, till the 7th of July.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — Sir, I wish to withdraw my motion, which stood for this night, for a Bill to enable Roman Catholics to hold the office of Lord Chancellor, and certain offices in the ecclesiastical courts in Ireland, till this day fortnight; and I shall then feel it my duty to explain the grounds upon which I found my motion, in consequence of some insane remarks that have been made in the other House of Parliament.

THE BIBLE IN SCOTLAND.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — Sir, I hope the Noble Lord opposite will not consider me pertinacious or troublesome, if I again venture to request some information from him on the subject of the expiration of the patent held by the Queen's printer in Scotland. On a former occasion, the Noble Lord told me what the Government did not intend to do. The Noble Lord stated that it was not intended to renew the patent, or to give the exclusive power of printing the Bible in Scotland to any corporate body, which might derive a profit from that exclusive privilege, and avail themselves of it to enhance the price of copies of the Scriptures. The Noble Lord said, also, that, at the same time, measures would be taken which should insure the authenticity of all copies of the Bible hereafter to be printed in Scotland. If, in order to carry this object into effect, the Noble Lord intends to proceed by a legislative measure, ample opportunity will be afforded for the discussion of its details; but I believe that an opinion is entertained that precautionary measures might be taken without the intervention of Parliament, and that Government intends to proceed jure coronæ. If so, I hope, as the people of Scotland regard this question with much interest, that I may be excused for saying that they would be glad if the Noble Lord would give them an outline of those precautionary measures.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Sir, the Right Honourable Gentleman has correctly stated what I said on a former occasion, which was, that it was not intended to give to any individual or corporation the exclusive right of printing the Bible with a view to profit, as that might enhance the prices at which Bibles could be sold. The Right Honourable Gentleman is, I think, perfectly justified in asking me what are the precautionary measures which the Government proposes to take in order to insure the correctness of the copies which will be printed after the patent has expired. What we propose is, that the Crown shall, by charter, incorporate a certain number of persons, say five persons, who shall have the exclusive right of printing the Bible in Scotland; one of these five persons to be the moderator of the Church of Scotland, two others divines of the Church of Scotland, and the remaining two, — laymen, but members of the Scottish Church. If a larger number than five persons should be incorporated, the board will still be constituted on the same principle. It is proposed that to this board shall be granted the exclusive right of printing the Bible in Scotland, under certain conditions. One of these conditions will be, the free importation of copies of the authorised version of the Bible in England. The Board will have the power to give their imprimatur to any person applying to them for that purpose, but upon the condition that the copies printed shall be revised by correctors appointed by the board, who will be able to say whether or not they are correct copies of the authorised version. With this limitation, it is proposed that there should, generally, be no restriction with regard to any publishers. In case of any pirating from any former edition of the Bible, it will be competent to the board to proceed by injunction, and to prevent such unauthorised and fraudulent publications. The mode in which this authority is to be exercised is, as the Right Honourable Gentleman has stated, jure coronæ, in accordance with Lord Lyndhurst's well-known judgment, in which it was laid down that persons pirating an edition of the Bible are liable to proceedings by injunction. The Right Honourable Gentleman has asked me whether it is proposed to proceed by statute, in the course of the present Session, in order to carry these measures into effect? Upon this point, I have not only consulted my Learned Friend the Lord Advocate, but also the Attorney General, and they are of opinion that it will not be necessary to introduce a Bill, but that the Crown has full power and authority to make all provisions necessary for the purpose. The Right Honourable Gentleman will therefore understand that it is not intended to propose a Bill; and that the opinion entertained, at present, is that the authority of the Crown is sufficient. If the Right Honourable Gentleman requires it, I will, to-morrow or next day, furnish him, in writing, with the conditions required; but the general nature of the plan is such as I have stated it, in order not to enhance the price.

SIR J. GRAHAM.— Sir, I have to tender my acknowledgments to the Noble Lord for the courtesy and explicitness of his answer. It would be irregular for me to express any opinion upon the merits of the plan, and I shall therefore not do so. Nothing can be fairer than the Noble Lord's proposition, however, to give me in writing a detailed statement of the conditions under which the proposed privilege is to be conferred. I shall be able to communicate this to the authorities in Scotland, and I will then let the Noble Lord know whether or not it is satisfactory to them.

PETITION OF MR. SAMUEL WELLS.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS. — Sir, I wish to call the attention of the House to the fact, that some days ago I presented a petition from Mr. Samuel Wells, a barrister, relative to the financial affairs of this country, which, upon my motion, was ordered to be printed; but that has not been done.

The SPEAKER. — The Honourable Member should renew his motion to have the petition printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. — Then, Sir, I beg to move that the petition be ordered to be printed forthwith.

SIR G. CLERK. — Sir, I do not know whether the Honourable Member for Coventry has stated if this petition is to be printed at the expense of the petitioner or the country, or any reason why the petition should be printed; nor has he intimated that it is his intention to bring forward any motion founded upon the petition. I cannot think that it would be wise for the House to order petitions of this kind to be printed at the public expense. When grievances are complained of, the House is bound to give every facility to the printing of petitions, if motions are to be founded upon them; but it cannot be proper for the House to order financial pamphlets to be printed at the expense of the public. This petition makes suggestions relative to the management of the revenue, and complains of no grievance. I think it would be highly improper for the House to sanction the printing of such a document. In my opinion, it ought to have been forwarded, not to the House, but to the Right Honourable Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS. — When I presented the petition, I distinctly said that I would call the attention of the House to the statements which it contained on Tuesday next. I believe a copy has been sent to the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Sir, I think the Honourable Baronet opposite (Sir G. Clerk) is perfectly right, and that there is a wide distinction to be taken between petitions complaining of actual grievances and petitions presented merely for the purpose of giving publicity to the theories of private individuals. I think it would be highly improper to order the publication of petitions which could only be considered as the speeches of individuals, who, from not being Members of Parliament, are unable to state their views and opinions personally in this House. If the petition alluded to comes under that description, it certainly would not be proper to order it to be printed at the public expense.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS. — It is not a speech, but a petition on a subject of the highest importance, and containing matter well deserving the attention of the House. It contains a vast deal of information on subjects of which most Members of this House know nothing. The motion was agreed to, and it must be printed.

Mr. P. THOMSON. — I think what the Honourable Member has just said is quite conclusive against the printing of the petition. It is, in fact, a pamphlet, and therefore not a document to be printed at the expense of the public.

LORD GRANVILLE SOMERSET. — I cannot find any mention of this affair in the "Votes," and I trust the House will not tolerate the printing of such pamphlets at the expense of the public.

Mr. J. FIELDEN. — The Honourable Member for Coventry distinctly gave notice of his intention to call the attention of the House to the petition which he presented.

The SPEAKER. — When the Honourable Member for Coventry presented the petition, he gave notice that it was his intention, on a subsequent day, to call the attention of the House to the statements which it contained. The Honourable Member then moved that the petition be printed; and to that motion the House, at the time, assented. The Committee on Petitions, however, refused to order the printing of the petition; and the question now is, whether the order of the House shall be discharged? The order, having once been made, must be complied with, unless rescinded.

SIR G. CLERK. — Sir, I beg leave, then, to move that that order be now discharged.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS. — I hope the Honourable Baronet will state some reason in justification of this motion. I believe, if the Honourable Baronet will read the petition, he will find that it relates to matters worthy of the gravest consideration, and that it contains a statement of facts founded upon Acts of Parliament. If there be anything disrespectful to the House in the petition, or anything improper, I should be glad to have it pointed out. I know Mr. Wells to be a most respectable person, who has devoted much of his time to the subject of finance; and, as I intend to call the attention of the House to the petition I have presented, I trust the Honourable Baronet will withdraw his motion.

Mr. WAKLEY. — Sir, my Honourable Friend states that this petition contains matter well worthy our consideration. The fact is, that the Honourable Baronet opposite has no intention to read the petition himself, and he is inclined to prevent every other person from reading it. I have no doubt that it contains matter worthy of the most serious consideration, for Mr. Wells has devoted much of his attention to the subject of finance.

[Laughter, and cries of "Oh!" "Question, question!"]

The House, too, has ordered the petition to be printed; and let Honourable Members consider what the effect will be, if its authority is to be set at defiance, or its orders disregarded. See what a condition we are in with respect to petitions. In this case, the House has ordered a petition to be printed; but here is a committee, placing itself above the House, and refusing to allow the order to be complied with. In my opinion, Honourable Members are not aware of the effect on the public mind of the manner in which petitions to this House are presented, and discussion on them restricted. The people are complaining, and justly, of the way in which their petitions are treated; and the restraints which are imposed upon Honourable Members of this House, relative to the presentation of petitions, are rendering the other House of Parliament, instead of this House, the popular branch of the Legislature. The other House of Parliament recognises popular abuses, is ever ready to attend to the complaints of the people, and to allow their petitions to be read and discussed; but, in this House, Honourable Members are not even allowed to read the petitions which are intrusted to them. If an Honourable Member attempt to read a portion of a petition in this House, or to state at any length the complaints it contains, he is instantly assailed with groans, and a noise is raised which absolutely prevents him from calmly directing his mind to the complaints of the petitioners. Is that fair to the public? or is it possible that such proceedings can have any other effect than that of lowering the House in the estimation of the country? If a Member happen to say he will read any petitions intrusted to him, he immediately finds himself addressing empty benches — no one will listen to him. I hope the resolutions of the House, relative to petitions, will be reconsidered and revised; for if they be not altered, so as to allow the complaints of the people to be fully stated, the House must fall into disrepute with the country, and the House of Lords become the popular assembly. How are petitions treated? They are laid on the table, backed by Mr. Ley, and then sent into a room where they are never more heard of; or else they go before a committee, and that committee follows the example of Mr. Ley, — few of them being printed, and nothing being done to make them public. In my opinion, every Member ought to be allowed to state fully the nature and object of the petitions which have been intrusted to him; and I hope the day will come when petitions will be discussed also.

COLONEL CONOLLY. — Why, Sir, it is evident that the Honourable Member for Finsbury is totally ignorant of the mode in which the Committee upon Petitions dispose of the petitions presented to the House. So far from obstructing the printing of petitions, or interfering with the orders of the House, the committee affords every facility to the publication of the complaints of the people. I do not think it fair to say that the committee treats petitions slightly, for every one acquainted with the subject knows that the reverse is the case. From my own experience, I am bound to say that, in my opinion, the present system is the best yet acted on; if we were to discuss petitions, it would be impossible to transact the public business.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — The House has already ordered the printing of this petition; and I am therefore of opinion that the Honourable Baronet, by the rules of the House, is bound to give notice before bringing forward a motion for discharging that order.

SIR G. CLERK. — Sir, I have not the slightest objection to withdraw my motion for the present, and to give notice for a future day, if such is the wish of the House. I do not think the Honourable Member for Cockermouth was present at the presentation of the petition; and I am perfectly sensible that if the attention of the House had been called to the petition at the time it was presented, it never would have been ordered to be printed. The reason why it escaped the attention of the House is well known. Honourable Members cannot fail to recollect the state of the House on Friday. Before hearing counsel on the Jamaica Bill the House was nearly empty, and the Members who were present were employed in conversation, as all the public business had most strangely been disposed of. It was at that time the petition was presented, and the motion for printing, actually, in consequence, escaped the notice of the House. The votes of Friday, the House will observe, contain no mention of any motion for the printing of the petition. It was not till the votes of Monday were published that I found an order for printing the petition. Now, when I look at the title of the petition, — "A Petition stating various Circumstances in our Financial Affairs and suggesting Changes in the Management thereof," — it appears to me that some mistake must have occurred respecting it. I do not mean to say that the petition contains anything improper, nor do I question in the least the respectability of the petitioner; but I must again repeat, that the document is not of that character which entitles it to be printed at the public expense. When petitions are presented, complaining of grievances, the House is always ready to give its attention to the prayer of the petitioners; and when a motion is to be founded upon a petition, there is never any unwillingness to allow it to be printed: but if the House were to allow those who are unable to obtain such publicity for their opinions as they might wish — if they are to allow every theorist and speculator, whether in finance, medicine, or law — to forward pamphlets to this House in the shape of petitions, and if they are to order those pamphlets to be published at the public expense, they would, in my opinion, be doing great injustice to those who have signed the 8600 petitions which have been presented during the Session, and who are the legitimate petitioners, because they complain of grievances, and ask for redress. As I said before, the petition ought to have been forwarded to the Chancellor of the Exchequer; and as I now see the Right Honourable Gentleman in his place, perhaps he will have the goodness to state whether he is of opinion that the petition is of sufficient importance to be published at the public expense?

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — Sir, I cannot allow what has fallen from the Honourable Member for Finsbury, relative to the Committee on Petitions, to pass without notice. The Honourable Member is far from being correct when he says that the petitions sent before the committee are never afterwards heard of. The committee have already presented to the House twenty-seven Reports upon petitions, each of which is of considerable bulk; and I think that the Honourable Member for Finsbury should, as a punishment for his erroneous statement, be made to read them.

Mr. A. YATES. — Sir, as one of the committee, I think it necessary to state that the committee examine, fully and with great care, all the petitions confided to them, and always order the publication of every petition which they consider important, or which they deem it necessary that the House and the public should be made acquainted with.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Sir, as I have been so pointedly alluded to, it may be necessary I should trouble the House with a few words. A copy of this petition was certainly forwarded to me, and I ought, therefore, perhaps, to be the last person to raise any objection to its being printed. I cannot, however, help saying, that if the House were once to sanction the printing of petitions, complaining of no grievance, nor in any way bearing on our proceedings, but only offering suggestions, they would soon, in my opinion, have cause to regret such a proceeding. It is not merely the expense I object to; but such a course, if once adopted, could not fail seriously to obstruct the public business. I think there can be no difficulty in postponing the motion; but if it should be postponed, Honourable Members will do well to consider the nature of the paper before voting for its being printed.

GENERAL JOHNSON. — I understand that the order for printing the petition was made on Friday, and I cannot think it fair to move that the order be now discharged. Surely, notice of such proceeding ought to have been given.

Question put, "That the said order be discharged;" and the House divided. The numbers were — Ayes 81; Noes 23; — Majority 58.

Mr. WAKLEY.—Sir, the order stands discharged by the vote of the House; but I understand that the petition is already printed. Is it, then, to be withheld from Members?

The SPEAKER. — The petition is not printed, but has been partly set up.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS. —Perhaps I may be allowed to withdraw the petition altogether.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. —The Honourable Gentleman cannot get his petition back; but he may have a copy of it, by paying the usual fees.

FACTORY ACT.

LORD ASHLEY. — I wish to ask the Honourable Member for Finsbury whether, as it is not likely there will be much chance of the attendance of the House affording him an opportunity of bringing forward his motion relating to the three Scotch witnesses examined with regard to the operation of the Factory Act, whose petition had been presented to the House, —it is his intention to postpone it? and, if so, whether he will bring it forward on a future day?

Mr. WAKLEY. — It certainly was my determination to bring forward the motion to which the Noble Lord refers; but I very much regret that there is little chance of doing so to-night with the slightest probability of success. The Honourable Member for Penryn has a motion on the paper which is likely to occupy several hours; and, more than that, I find that her Majesty's Government are determined to oppose my motion. It is, therefore, my intention to postpone the motion until this day three weeks, when I shall certainly bring it forward, and press it to a division.

Mr. F. MAULE. — Sir, I cannot allow this motion to be postponed, without protesting against the course which the Honourable Member for Finsbury has taken. His motion carries with it an attack upon a public servant; and I must say, that the thus putting it off from day to day—this being the second time it has been deferred, as it is now to be for another three weeks — is most unfair, not only to that individual, but to those who have to defend his character, and who have a considerable quantity of other business, both in and out of the House, to attend to. I have come down to the House prepared to meet the motion of my Honourable Friend, and I think it rather hard that it should be put off in this way.

Mr. WAKLEY. — Sir, the fact is, that I have not before postponed my motion at all. I fixed on a day for bringing it before the House, and lost no opportunity of doing so; but I now find that the Government are strongly opposed to it, and that they have "whipped" for it. I have no means of "whipping" in support of my motion. I can see very well what the state of the benches is at this moment; but I know equally well what it will be when the time comes for me to be called upon by the Chair. I made no attack on the character of Mr. Stewart; but if I had done so, I should not have acted worse than that individual has behaved towards three helpless men. At the same time, I beg to state that it is not my intention to spare him.

TURNPIKE TRUSTS.

Mr. MACKINNON. — Sir, it is now my duty to move for leave to bring in a Bill to alter and amend the laws regarding turnpike trusts, and to allow of unions of the same. My only desire, in doing so, is, to throw some light upon the subject, and to bring the question fairly before the House; and I hope to be able, by the statements I am about to make, to shew that the measure I now propose, in my capacity of chairman of the committee which sat on this subject, is one well worthy their attention. Sir, on that committee we have been deprived of the assistance of Lord Clive; we have also lost your own able assistance; but any inconvenience we have suffered on that account is amply counterbalanced by the satisfaction all must experience at seeing you in your present position. I believe the House is scarcely aware of the importance of the subject; and although it is a dry one, the House will be convinced that it is an important one, when I remind them that these trusts are at the present time in debt to the extent of 9,000,000*l.* sterling, and that they have no means of discharging the same. On the contrary, it is increasing every day, from various causes. One of the chief causes is, that those who manage the trusts, finding themselves unable to pay the interest of the debt, give bonds for that interest, thus converting the interest into principal, and, in fact, increasing their debt at the rate of compound interest. Another cause is, the establishment of railroads, of which there are now no fewer than six lines diverging from the metropolis, and extending into different parts of the country. Again, independently of those two causes, which very much increase the debts of turnpike trusts, it must also be recollected that, by the Act of George III. cap. 123., any creditor of a trust has the power of taking possession of the tolls, and dividing the produce as he thinks proper among the other creditors of the trust. It is impossible not to foresee the ruinous consequences which are likely to result from such a course. Another point of great moment, in this question, is the entire abolition of statute labour, by which these trusts have sustained a loss of not less than 200,000*l.* annually. A Bill was brought in last Session to remedy that evil; but, though it passed through this House, it did not, unfortunately, get through the other House. But I confess that there would be considerable difficulty in suggesting any remedy for the distressed state of the tolls. My Honourable Friend the Under Secretary of State brought in a Bill, in which he made an attempt to consolidate all the turnpike trusts into one, and to have them managed solely by a board in London. Although the Honourable Gentleman was supported by the whole of the interest of the Government, such was the opposition he met with that he was unable to carry his measure. I believe that the chief cause of the opposition to that Bill was the system of centralisation which he adopted. The country gentlemen of England felt averse to any plan of that kind; and they thought the power of superintendence and management ought to remain in their hands. Another cause was the arrangement which the Honourable Gentleman made, that trusts of every description should be consolidated together; and that, I thought, was the great error of his Bill. Moreover, he gave the commissioners to be appointed to carry out the measure, sitting in London, power to unite wealthy trusts with poor ones, and thus to saddle them with debts which others ought to pay. Another objection to the plan of the Honourable Gentleman was, that he left all the machinery of the old trusts without any means of subsistence; the solicitors, secretaries, clerks, and others employed by the old trusts, were left wholly unprovided for; and they of course raised such a clatter throughout the country, and made such strong appeals to Honourable Members representing places in their respective localities, that my Honourable Friend was at last compelled to throw up the Bill altogether.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I am afraid you will be obliged to abandon yours.

Mr. MACKINNON.—I hope for better success. Now, the committee have endeavoured to meet all these objections: they propose that there should be unions, not a consolidation of turnpike trusts; and that those unions should be under the superintendence, not of a board in London, but of persons selected by the trustees, who are to have the whole management of the same. Still, it would be impossible to carry this plan into effect without allowing the Government to have a central board, but not with such powers as were contemplated by the former Bill; because, without some such central authority, the other board could not be made to act in a satisfactory manner. The Bill I wish to bring in will also have, for its object, the catching of the traffic which now runs to the railways by by roads and cross roads. The traffic on all the cross and by roads which lead to the termini of railways has very much increased; and my object is to give these trusts a power to transfer the toll-gates to those cross and by roads; in fact, — to use a simile which the Honourable Member for Finsbury will understand, — to make the veins of traffic arteries, and the arteries veins. I am the last man who would wish to stand forward on a question of this importance; but, as chairman of the committee which sat upon this subject, I did not feel myself justified in withdrawing from my task, until I had, at least, elicited from her Majesty's Government whether or not the commission which has been appointed was likely to lead to legislation in this matter, upon their authority? I shall, therefore, now move for leave to bring in a Bill "To provide for making Unions of Turnpike Trusts in England, and for valuing and consolidating the Bonded Debts of such Trusts."

On the question being put, —

Mr. FOX MAULE said: — Sir, I do not rise to throw any difficulty in the way of the introduction of the Bill, for I consider that the House owes to the Honourable Member a debt of gratitude for the great pains he has taken with this subject. I feel that the Honourable Gentleman opposite, as chairman of the committee to which he has alluded, could not have taken any other course than that which he has pursued; but I fear that the Honourable Member's Bill will, in the face of the commission which has been appointed, share the same fate as the Bill which I formerly introduced. My Bill had a recommendation which the Bill proposed by the Honourable Member has not, — namely, that under my Bill the Government proposed to advance a considerable sum of money for the purpose of consolidating the debts due by turnpike trusts. At present, it is impossible the Government can propose any such measure; and it was in order to get some more grave authority, — an authority on which the country gentlemen could place more reliance than on the Report of a committee, — that the Government was induced to issue a commission, consisting of the Duke of Richmond, the Marquess of Salisbury, Lord Hatherton, and Lord Eliot, to inquire into the best mode of treating this subject. It is a subject which may not, perhaps, interest many persons in this House; but in it the poorer classes are deeply concerned, because many individuals who had lent their "little all" on the security of turnpike trusts — (the best security on which to advance money at the time of lending) — are, now, absolutely in despair as to the probability of recovering one farthing of their advances. That this state of things ought to be remedied, nobody can deny. I think the efforts of the Honourable Member opposite (Mr. Mackinnon) most praiseworthy, and I am ready to consider — and give him every assistance in aid of — his measure; but, at the same time, I must say that, at this period of the Session, it is impossible to legislate successfully. Next year, the commission which has been appointed will, I think, present such a Report as that the Government may found upon it a measure which will then be fairly and fully considered by Parliament.

COLONEL WOOD. — I certainly think the House is indebted to my Honourable Friend the Member for Lymington for having elicited the statement just made by the Honourable Under Secretary. I rejoice that the Government has issued this commission, because I am of opinion that, unless Government will take up the matter, the difficulties that surround it can never be got rid of. For my own part, I see no way out of these difficulties, except by the Government taking on themselves the whole tolls, paying the debts of the trusts, and establishing one uniform rate of toll throughout the country.

Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. MACKINNON and COLONEL RUSHBROOKE.

COURT OF EXCHEQUER.

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — Sir, I rise, in pursuance of the notice I have given, to move for a Return of the number of days the Court of Exchequer, as a court of equity, sat, for the despatch of business, for the ten years ending 1830, inclusive; showing the number of days the court sat in each term, and at the sittings after each term. A more important subject than that which the object of my motion embraces could scarcely be addressed to this assembly. The subject is no less than that of the administration of justice within these realms, — a subject which was recommended to the attention of Parliament in her Majesty's most gracious Speech from the throne at the opening of the present Session. In dealing with this question I shall necessarily be obliged to advert to a subject which has recently been discussed in another place, — I allude to the state of business in the Court of Chancery. In that discussion the Court of Exchequer was brought under notice; and, now that it is my duty to call attention to the Court of Exchequer, I fear I shall be obliged to allude incidentally to the Court of Chancery. It is scarcely necessary to remind the House that the Court of Exchequer in England has two jurisdictions, — the one a common law, and the other an equity jurisdiction; and as that court existed prior to the statute of 33 Hen. VIII., it is possessed of those jurisdictions by prescription. It is my object to show, by the Returns for which I now move, that this court, which was a good and perfect court of equity anterior to the year 1817, when Parliament began to legislate with respect to it, has deteriorated as a court of equity, though its practice has been increased as a court of common law. Before the year 1817, the court sat, daily, as a court of equity, not only through term, but also during a large portion of the sittings after term; but in that year, — with the best intentions, I do not doubt, on the part of the Legislature, — an Act was passed, — the 57 Geo. III., — by which the Lord Chief Baron of the Exchequer had conferred upon him power, alone, to hear and determine causes on the equity side of the court; the previous practice having been that all the judges of the court were obliged to sit together, whether as a court of equity or as a court of common law. Not only was power given by that statute to the Lord Chief Baron to sit, alone, in equity, but that he should so sit on such days as might be most convenient to himself. Now it will be found, by the Returns for which I am about to move, that, in practice, but very few days have been devoted to the equity business of the court, — because, the Lord Chief Baron's presence being required on the common law side of the court, that learned personage gives to the equity side only such time as he can afford to it; he is not bound to sit daily; and thus a very few days are appropriated to the equity jurisdiction, and those few days are entirely insufficient to the transaction of the business in equity; and hence it is that the legislation of 1817, even so far, has rendered the Court of Exchequer, as a court of equity, far less complete than it previously was. In July, 1830, the then Chancellor (Lord Lyndhurst) introduced a Bill "for the more effectual Administration of Justice in England;" and though that Bill in its provisions was not strictly applicable to the Court of Exchequer, still it contained provisions that the right of attorneys of the Court of Exchequer exclusively to practise in that court should be abolished, but that all attorneys of the superior courts in Westminster Hall should be empowered and admitted to practise in that court, on the pleas or common law side. Prior to this enactment, the pleas, or common law, side of the court had but little extent of business; but by this change the suitors lost the opportunity of transacting business on the equity side of the court, the time of the Chief Baron and the other Barons being wholly occupied on the common law side. So matters proceeded until the year 1833, when the statute 3 and 4 Will. IV. was passed, and which, in respect to this court as a court of equity, rendered it even less effective than it was before.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER. — I move that the House be counted.

Mr. HAWES, on presenting this petition, said: — The petitioner, who is a member of the Royal College of Surgeons, states that in December last he removed some furniture from a house in Camberwell under legal authority; that, some time after, he had observed that a person had been tried and convicted for stealing the same furniture, and that that person is now suffering imprisonment for that supposed offence. I have minutely examined the merits of the case, I have had the opinion of lawyers upon it, and I am satisfied of the truth and justice of the petitioner's case. It has been twice submitted to the authorities at the Home Office, who, on one occasion, took no less than seven weeks to make up their minds, and then decided against the application. I will not go further into the case at present; but I cannot avoid expressing my own conviction of the innocence of the individual who has been found guilty of the supposed offence. I shall merely move that the petition be printed with the votes, at the same time giving notice of my intention to bring it under the notice of the House on the first supply day.

Mr. F. MAULE. — This is a petition on behalf of an individual suffering legal punishment by the verdict of a jury. When application is thought proper to be made on behalf of persons so situated, the usual course is to apply to the Home Office. In this case two such applications were made; and I doubt whether it would be judicious for the House, under those circumstances, to interfere. The whole case was gone into, and strictly examined by the authorities at the Home Office. They do not pretend to be infallible; but their decision coincided with the opinion of the judge and the verdict of the jury, — which, certainly, is a strong presumption in favour of the correctness of that verdict. The Home Office will not shrink from any scrutiny that may be instituted. If they had a doubt, they would be willing to give it in favour of the prisoner. In the mean time, I am ready to consent to the printing of the petition.

LORD J. RUSSELL said: — I give notice that I shall, to-morrow, move the reception of the Report of the Committee on the Jamaica Government Bill, and the third reading on Friday next.

RATING OF TENEMENTS BILL.

Order for committee read; motion made, and question proposed, by Mr. GORDON, — "That the Speaker do now leave the chair."

Mr. J. JERVIS. — Sir, I find considerable difficulty in offering any opposition to the Honourable Gentlemen opposite, who have devoted so much time and labour to the present measure. My objections to it, however, continue so strong that I am obliged — however reluctantly — to oppose it. When I came into the House, I found a general understanding existing that there was to be no opposition to the Bill, in consequence of its details having been somewhat altered. These alterations, however, do not satisfy me, as it is to the principle I object. The main principle is this, — not that the rates of all classes of houses are to be paid by the landlords; but, in the case of a particular class of houses, the rents of which do not exceed 9*l.* a-year; and even in cases where the rent is payable four or more times a-year; — thus rendering the occupier for a month subject to rate. Now, this principle will entirely conflict with the rights of occupiers of tenements, and also with their privilege of the franchise. Besides, as all acts in vestries must be done by householders paying rates, their parochial rights will incidentally be destroyed. To those Gentlemen who object to the practice of plural voting, this Bill must be particularly obnoxious. It will, also, act injuriously on the owners of cottages, and deter others from building them; whereas, instead of that, it ought to be the policy of this House to encourage the erection of proper dwellings for the poor. But the persons who build cottages are, generally, persons who have accumulated a small capital in trade, and who invest it thus, in hopes of good interest; and if they find that they are responsible for the rates, they will turn their money into some other channel. It appears, however, that the landlords of cottages are to have an allowance of 50 per cent. on their rates. This will not satisfy them; and, if it did, it would prejudice other persons. I apprehend that this Bill will seriously injure the class of persons occupying cottages. It will crowd families into old dilapidated houses, and deprive the poor man of that protection which he most values — that of his own house, which should be his castle. The rent of these cottages must be raised according to the rate; — so that those which pay 9*l.* now, must be raised to 12*l.* Another objection I have to this Bill is, that it will take away his vote from the cottager. The committee say they have provided for this by enacting that the cottager may claim to be rated. Now, I totally disapprove of that. I do not think the franchise should be an object of individual benefit, but it should be a bounden duty on every man to exercise it. This last objection is, in my opinion, conclusive against the Bill. The committee say that this Bill is not to take effect, except in cases where two thirds of the landlords wish for it. This may be a protection for the landlord, but it can be none for the occupier. I therefore think it my duty to move an amendment to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day six months, resolve itself into the said committee," instead thereof.

SIR J. GUEST. — Sir, I object to the Bill, as extremely oppressive on the class of small occupiers. If you impose taxes on the cottages, you will deter capitalists from building habitations for the poor.

Mr. R. GORDON. — The Honourable Member for Chester's determined opposition to the present measure convinces me that all attempts to conciliate enemies are fruitless. I have endeavoured to meet and obviate all fair and reasonable objections, and yet I find that the Bill is as violently resisted as ever. I contend that some such measure as the present is requisite, because, according to the existing law, a man may occupy a certain quantity of land for the purpose of cultivation, and he will then become liable for the rates; but if he cover his piece of ground with small tenements, he will then be exempt from rate; — and thus, considerable hardship may be done to parishes; for, with an increased population, they will actually be in the receipt of a diminished amount of rate. I am sure my Honourable Friend the Member for Chester would not attempt to raise a feeling against the Bill by saying it was an enactment against the poor. I maintain it is in favour of the poor; and for that reason, the committee recommend it. How are the facts? By the law, known as Scrope's Law, every house must be rated; and it is quite clear that, unless Parliament consent to modify that Act, some measure like this must be passed. I do trust that, unless Honourable Members confess that they object to the principle, they will allow it to go into committee. All we wish to do is, to prevent expense and trouble to landlords and occupiers.

Mr. G. PALMER. — Sir, the owners of small tenements are unable, in many instances, to obtain any rent from the poorer occupiers; and if you impose a rate upon those cottages, to be paid by the landlords, the effect will be seriously injurious to the poor; as the landlords cannot be expected to keep up cottages, for which, instead of obtaining rent, they will be obliged to pay money out of their own pockets in the shape of rates. I must, therefore, vote against the Bill.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS. — Sir, if this Bill should pass, I am persuaded that there is not a corporation in England in which a great portion of the constituency will not be disfranchised. The Bill will also prevent the laying out of money upon the building of cottages by small tradesmen retiring from business; and the consequence will be, that the comforts of the poor will be greatly diminished. In fact, in my opinion, the Bill is objectionable from beginning to end, and ought to be rejected by the House. I shall vote for the amendment of the Honourable Member for Chester.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON. — Sir, I feel myself, although reluctantly, obliged to oppose the Bill. It will seriously affect the constituencies of large towns, and tend to prevent the building of cottages. The comforts of the poor would be greatly diminished, if such a measure were to come into operation; — they would be crowded into small and ill-built dwellings; and, in such a case, it would be impossible for them to give that attention to cleanliness which is so necessary to insure their health and comfort. My Honourable Friend opposite has done everything possible to make the measure agreeable to the House; — he has given, even to landlords, an allowance of 50*l.* per cent. on the poor-rate. Now, I think this will be as greatly too much in some cases as it will be too little in others. In agricultural districts it will, for instance, be all pure profit. I shall not further occupy the time of the House; but, in obedience to the call of my constituents, and my own opinion, I shall, therefore, oppose the Bill.

Mr. M. PHILIPS. — Sir, I shall give my ardent support to the Bill; but I beg to assure the House that I do so from no feeling of private interest. When thousands of pounds are yearly laid out on the building of cottages, from which large profits are derived, I cannot help thinking that such property ought to be made to contribute to the poor-rates. The principles of the Bill seem to me to be fair and just; and, although I cannot approve of some of its details, yet, upon the whole, it comes so near to my views, that I shall give the measure my most cordial support.

Mr. PRYME. — Sir, the objection which I have to this Bill has never been answered to my satisfaction. My objection is this; — it appears to me that, whenever a plot of building ground is to be had, if the building cottages be more profitable than any other mode of investment, then cottages will be built, accordingly, and they will increase until the rent falls to the level of the interest derivable from other investments. I say, therefore, that according, not merely to the principles of political economy, but of common sense, wherever there is room and a chance of profit, cottages will be built. Then, when this Bill passes, its operation will be to lay a tax on the landlords, who will consequently raise the rents; and thus, in every town, the poorer classes will be injured. My objection to this Bill, then, is, that it will be a house-tax on the labourer and humble artisan. My Honourable Friend has done every thing he could to modify the details; but my objection is to the principle, and no modification can make me support it. I also object to it on account of its effect on the franchise. My Honourable Friend says that an occupier may, under the Bill, get rated, if he wishes; but I ask any man who has a knowledge of human nature, does he think one in ten of the occupiers would take the trouble, or seek to pay the rate, for the sake of the franchise?

Mr. BRISCOE. — Sir, disposed as I am, at all times, to attend to the claims of the poor, I think that the owners of cottages have in this case made a strong appeal to us. I agree with my Honourable Friend that the present law is remarkable for its severity. Under the Poor Law Amendment Act the rate is not remitted, as heretofore, by consent of the overseers before the magistrates in petty sessions; but it is necessary to have the consent of the board of guardians as well as of the magistrates, before those who are unable to pay poor-rates can be relieved. I feel it necessary to urge the House to take this question into its serious consideration, because it is not one which affects the owners of cottages only, but the welfare of millions of the poorer classes of the community. The House is little aware of the wide-spreading dissatisfaction of the working classes, at the present time, by reason of the working of Mr. Scrope's Act. In a parish in which I have property, there has been an increase, under that Act, of from 427 to 1018 ratepayers, while rateable property has increased in the same ratio, the augmentation of the amount of rates being from 16,000*l.* to a sum exceeding 20,000*l.* Consequently, a very large number of day labourers who earn not more than 10*s.* or 12*s.* per week are now called upon to pay poor-rates, — they not having been rated before. A collector of poor-rates, in speaking of these poor people, said to me, "If you had witnessed the distresses of the poorer classes which I have seen, your heart would bleed. I am often compelled to come out of their cottages by the spectacles of misery I find in them." There is, in fact, the greatest difficulty experienced in collecting the poor-rate. A most respectable clergyman of the Church of England told me, a short time ago, that the sacrament money which he gave to a poor widow, being only 2*s.*, was immediately paid to save her little goods from being taken away by the collector of the poor-rate. I am quite at a loss to understand how this Bill will prevent the building of such cottages as are suitable to poor men, or how it will injure the property, because the tenement which is free of this charge to the occupier, must of course be more desirable to him, and therefore will be more valuable to the owner. I will only, in addition, ask the House to remember that the Act is not imperative, and I trust they will let it go to the committee.

Mr. SLANEY. — Sir, as this Bill has been repeatedly under the consideration of committees, and great pains have been taken to prepare it, it would be but fair to the promoters of the measure that it should now be suffered to go into committee. Will the House throw out the Bill without affording an opportunity for showing what improvements have been made in it? The principal objection to this Bill is, that it will take away the franchise; but the only parties who can enjoy the franchise are those who pay rates, and they are excepted by the Bill. By Mr. Scrope's Act all property was assessed to the poor-rate, and no person could be excused only on the ground that he had been a recipient of relief out of the rate. Therefore, the rate was to be gathered from all persons not so excused, — a regulation which necessarily included an immense number of poor people, who, though not actually receiving or asking parochial relief, were totally unable, out of their small incomes, to pay poor-rates. Every possible means was resorted to in order to exact the rate from them; — they were summoned over and over again; and very frequently their little household furniture, comprising only bare necessaries, were sold under distress for them. I believe this Bill will have the effect of bringing back a considerable portion of property that ought to be rated, while it will relieve many poor persons, and prevent them from becoming burdensome to their parishes. I think the excitement and dissatisfaction existing among the lower classes in relation to this subject are a strong reason why the House ought to suffer this Bill to pass, or at least to go into committee, in order that it may be made an efficient and beneficial law.

Mr. SCROPE. — Sir, I beg to explain that all my Act provided was, that if tenements were rated, they should be rated at their full value. It did not compel property to be charged which had not been previously rated. I think this Bill would have the effect of preventing a better class of dwellings being built for the occupation of the labouring classes, and that it would be injurious in other respects to the poor man; and therefore I shall strenuously oppose it.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question."

CUSTODY OF INFANTS BILL.

On the motion of Mr. SERJEANT TALFOURD, the House resolved itself into a committee on this Bill.

Clause 1. was agreed to, with verbal amendments.

On Clause 2. (enacting that the mother may have access to her infant on a return of a writ of habeas corpus) being put,—

SIR EDWARD SUGDEN said:—I now rise, Sir, pursuant to the notice I have given, to move that this and the following clauses be expunged from the Bill. The merits of this question having been fully discussed on a former occasion, Honourable Members are, doubtless, aware of the nature of the ground which has been taken by my Honourable and Learned Friend in reference to the subject of this measure. It will be, therefore, unnecessary for me to occupy the time of the House more than will be required for me to go over the main points of the question. The other clauses, in point of fact, although the same in substance, are different in form, to the former Bill. The first clause which I oppose provides, whenever any court or judge shall, upon the return of a writ of habeas corpus, issued at the instance of the father of any infant or infants, order such infant or infants to be delivered to such father by the mother, it shall be lawful for such court or judge to provide, by order, for the access of the mother to such infants. And the next clause says, that the Lord Chancellor, the Master of the Rolls, and the Vice Chancellor in England, or the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, respectively, may, upon hearing the petition of the mother of any infant, being in the sole custody and control of the father thereof, or of any person by his authority, make order, if he shall see fit, for the access of the petitioner to such infant, and if such infant shall be within the age of seven years, make order that such infant shall be delivered to, and remain in the custody of, the petitioner, until attaining such age. Now, the objection I have to these clauses rests upon principle. I believe the operation of this Bill, if passed in its present shape, will be to reduce the obligations of marriage, and will thereby prove detrimental to the best interests of married women and their offspring. The committee, upon reflection, must agree with me in the opinion that, if facilities are given to separations, as must be the result of this Bill, those separations must ultimately lead to divorces, with all their attendant evils. Though there may be some hardships in the existing law, as to mothers, in this respect, still there is no country in the world in which married women have so complete a protection as that afforded them by the general laws of this country; and I would have the committee be cautious, lest, while it pretends to take care of their interests, it relax the protection to which they are already entitled. Under the present law, parents — mothers especially — have a great inducement, from the natural love and affection they bear to their children, to put up with many petty trifling differences and annoyances which there are no means of remedying, because the marriage tie remains unbroken: the children form the common link which binds the parties together. But this Bill would lead to collision of interests between the father and the mother as regards their children, and, in many cases, separations, followed by divorces, would ensue, simply because of the facilities afforded mothers of indulging their natural love by access to their offspring. The law of England wisely says that the right of the custody of the children is vested in the father, — and that law is consonant with the laws of a higher authority: why, then, should the Legislature interfere? There may be — and I will not deny it — numerous cases in which that law operates with hardship upon mothers; but the Legislature is bound to look to the welfare of married women as a class, and not to have regard to individual cases. If a child be taken from the father for seven years, as proposed by the Bill, who is to maintain and educate that child? The balance of mischief is against the provisions of the Bill; and, though the evils of the present system are, to a certain extent, pressing, still those evils will be better corrected by the tone and morals of society than by any law that can be devised. If this Bill pass, though it may afford relief in some cases, yet it must also create difficulties a hundredfold, from which families can never extricate themselves. With regard to the next clause, giving authority in these matters to courts of equity, I must say it would be a great evil; for, with the pressure of business before those courts, this new jurisdiction would lead to a denial of justice to suitors in equity. I therefore hope the committee will not support these clauses. It now only remains for me to move, Sir, that all the clauses after the first be omitted.

Mr. SERJEANT TALFOURD. — Sir, I entirely concur in the arrangement made by the Right Honourable Gentleman, which enables us to come sooner to the discussion of the principle of the Bill; and, as the objections of the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman apply to the principle and not the details of the measure, I think the course he has taken, in this motion, is perfectly consistent with the object he has in view. My Right Honourable and Learned Friend says that his objections to the Bill are to the principle; and, Sir, I at once say that, on the ground of principle, I am ready to meet him — upon the principle of that boasted law of England, by which mothers are left without redress, and by which, even, in cases where an injured wife has been compelled to prosecute the husband, he has still had the power of withholding from them, the happiness of seeing their children. If the law of England had remained silent upon this subject, I should have acknowledged that much might be advanced against this Bill; but the law has interposed, — and, I am sorry to say, has, for a long series of years, interposed very strongly on the wrong side, — it has even committed an injured and innocent wife to the Fleet Prison, at the suit of her husband, for disobeying the mandate of the Court of Queen's Bench, which had ordered that her children should be torn from her. Therefore, the law has interposed; but not on the side most requiring protection. Now, in Scotland, where the people are certainly as moral as in England, and where the nuptial vow is observed with equal fidelity and strictness, although, perhaps, marriages may be contracted with too dangerous a facility, the law gives power to the judges to interfere and give the custody of the children to the mother in certain cases. For this reason I have not thought it necessary to extend the Bill to Scotland. In cases where the child has been entitled to property, and where it has been thought necessary for his morals and welfare that he should be separated from the father, the Court of Chancery has interfered, — not, indeed, on behalf of the mother, but to prevent the father from having the custody of the child, as in the case of the poet Shelley, where the mother had gone to her grave, and the father was deprived of his children. There is another case, to which I would not allude were it not so extensively known, — I mean that of Long Wellesley, — in which a similar power was exercised by Lord Eldon. Sir, my Right Honourable and Learned Friend has said that the judges of the land are opposed to this Bill; but, with respect to the clause immediately under the consideration of the committee, I cannot bring myself to believe that those learned personages object to the principle it embodies; and, indeed, with reference to one or two of the judges, I believe I may venture to assert the contrary to be the fact. With regard to the next clause, which gives the custody of the children to the mothers for the first seven years, I introduced that provision, because, when the first Bill was brought forward, a taunt was thrown out by some very influential persons in another place, that the clause it contained did not go far enough. All that this clause does is, to enable a court of equity to place an innocent and injured wife in the same situation as the guilty mother of bastard children. She has a right to the custody of her children till they are seven years of age, against the father and against all the world. I only ask this — I only ask that the wife shall have the same privilege as the mother of bastards; and am I to be told, by way of answer, that the Court of Chancery is choked up with business? But I will not fatigue the committee by entering into this part of the subject. The law, as it now stands, has increased and prolonged misery and wretchedness, by compelling the parties to reside under the same roof under penalty of the oppressed and injured wife forfeiting the comfort of her children's society, — it has had the effect of compelling the honourable and chaste wife to reside under the same roof with the shameless mistress, — nay, it has given power to the vindictive and tyrannical husband to visit his malignity upon his wife after his death, and, by testamentary enactment, to prevent her from having access to her children. The question is, — ought not such a law to be changed? All the Bill proposes is, to give the judges a discretionary power to decide upon the merits of individual cases — a power, the want of which they have complained of whenever they have had occasion to enforce the existent right of the father over his children, to the exclusion of the mother.

Mr. LANGDALE. — As I trespassed upon the indulgence of the House on a former occasion, I shall not now hesitate to do so, in the performance of my duty, however unpopular it may be. I feel called upon to express my opposition to the present measure, as I am sure, if the Bill pass, that it will do away with many of the impediments which now stand in the way of applying for divorces. If, when parties are separated, you do anything to increase the already existing excitement between them, you diminish the probability of promoting a reconciliation. I think that it is the most unfortunate circumstance that can happen to a woman, to be separated from her husband and children; and I oppose this Bill as being calculated to remove some of the great impediments to separation, and to promote separation when otherwise it would not take place.

Mr. W. COWPER. — I certainly feel it my duty to support this Bill. The principle of the measure is to leave the decision to the most impartial persons, — namely, the judges of the land, — instead of leaving it to a father, in a moment of irritation, — to declare whether the mother shall or shall not see her children. I do not anticipate that any of those evils will follow from this Bill which the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman has prophesied.

The committee then divided: — Ayes 49; Noes 11; — Majority (against exclusion of clauses) 38.

ELECTORS' REMOVAL BILL.

On the motion of Mr. M. GIBSON, for the House to resolve itself into a committee on this Bill, —

SIR A. DALRYMPLE said: — I am glad to see the Honourable and Learned Attorney and Solicitor General in their places; and, as I object to this Bill, as departing from the most essential principles of the Reform Act, and enabling an individual to retain his vote for fifteen months after he has really forfeited it, I would ask whether the measure has the support of her Majesty's Government?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I do not mean to argue any of the details; but, in answer to the question which has just been put by the Honourable Gentleman, I wish to say that this Bill does meet with the hearty concurrence of her Majesty's Government. The measure will confer the right of voting upon many who are now deprived of it; and I rejoice that it has been introduced. I shall, undoubtedly, give the Bill every support in my power.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — I have no hesitation in saying that this Bill meets, also, with my warm and hearty concurrence. For five years I have been trying to effect the object proposed to be effected by this measure. Five years ago, to my knowledge, some thousands of voters were disfranchised in Edinburgh, in consequence of mere change of residence, although changing only in the same street, and even in cases where the tenants had removed into houses of greater value; and from that time to the present, I have been doing my best to correct the evil. This is by no means a new measure, nor does it involve a new principle; and I am happy to say that it meets with the approbation of the Noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and all her Majesty's Ministers. For myself, I shall support it to the utmost of my power; and I trust it will pass with the unanimous assent of this House.

SIR FREDERICK POLLOCK. — If the argument of my Honourable and Learned Friend could be carried out, so as to apply to every class of voters, it would be just and proper; but I think it is to be regretted that this Bill does not meet all the objections that exist to the present state of things. It extends only to one class of voters, and does not include another — namely, freeholders. Now, I should like to know, if a man has exchanged one property for another, — probably of greater value,—why he should not vote for the county? My Learned Friend complains that voters should be disfranchised merely in consequence of a change of residence, occurring, probably, only in the same street, and, perhaps, into a house of greater value; but there is this practical difficulty in the way of any alteration; — you require a certain officer—the registering barrister — to ascertain that the voter does occupy a house of the value required by the law; and my Learned Friend, in his argument, did not appear to contemplate the possibility of a voter going into a house of less value, as well as his exchanging into a tenement of greater value; and in such a case, how is the qualification required by law to be ascertained? In the first place, I think this Bill ought to be co-extensive with all the cases that may arise; and, secondly, that due care should be taken that every person who presents himself to vote should have first been ascertained to be duly qualified to exercise the franchise.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — I hope that my Honourable Friend will not be seduced into giving up any part of his Bill. I agree with my Honourable and Learned Friend as to the principle applying to the counties; but this I say, — that the only practical difficulty has been felt with regard to the removal of 10*l.* householders.

Many Honourable Friends of mine think there ought to be no qualification at all; others think it ought to be higher; but all agree that the qualification is only intended as a test of the fitness of the party to exercise the elective franchise. Now, if a person possess the proper qualification in November, what reason is there to suppose that he has lost it in August? That is the plain common sense of the question. Under the present system, the only interrogatory put to the voter is this; — "Are you in possession of the same qualification you had?" What is the consequence? The honest man answers "No," — and loses his vote; while the dishonest man who chooses to interpret the question in a sense different from its real meaning, answers "Yes," — and retains his vote. The only way to cut this knot is to make the registration for [a year. Never was there a question that was less of a party question than this, for it equally concerns all parties. I beg to say that I shall give my best support to the Bill.

Mr. V. SMITH. — I would put it to my Honourable Friend, whether it would not be possible to obviate the inconvenience of putting the question to the scot and lot voters under the Reform Bill? The question applies to them as well as to the 10*l.* householders; and, really, I think such object would come within the scope of this Bill.

Mr. M. GIBSON. — On a full consideration of the subject, I have framed the best measure I could. If Honourable Members have additions or alterations to propose, I shall be ready to discuss them. I beg to add, that it has not been a question with me, whether the measure would benefit Conservatives the most, or Whigs the most. That is an objectionable principle for the House to consider measures on. The question ought to be, which is the most for the public good?

SIR A. DALRYMPLE. — It appears to me that the object of this Bill might have been effected in the Registration Bill.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — I assure my Honourable Friend he is mistaken, because this Bill alters, to a certain extent, the right of voting; and it is not a mere question of registration.

The House then resolved itself into a committee on the Bill.

On Clause 1. ("Electors not to lose right of voting by removal after registration") being put, —

Mr. H. HODGSON said: — I have no objection to a householder, removing from one house to another of equal value in the borough, retaining his vote; but this I do object to, — that, by this Bill, a voter, being registered on the 10th of November, should lose his qualification by removing 100 miles off, and yet, at the end of the year, come back to the borough and vote. Moreover, some difficulty might arise in proving the exact value of the tenement before the returning officer; but I think this difficulty might be obviated by proving that, at the time of voting, the elector is a rated inhabitant of the borough. I beg leave, therefore, to move that these words be inserted at the end of the clause: — "Provided always, that no such elector shall be entitled to vote, unless he shall, at the time of tendering his vote, be a rated inhabitant of the said city or borough."

Mr. M. GIBSON. — I think that the difficulty which the Honourable Member wishes to remove would still exist under his proviso. This sort of vexatious questions, which continually come before committees of the House, it has been a principal object with me to prevent, or at least to simplify. As we are, perhaps, not very likely to get a tribunal for trial of election petitions which will be competent to decide complicated questions of law, I think the best thing that can be done is to simplify and abridge, as much as possible, the questions which come before them for decision. I must, therefore, resist the amendment.

Mr. BROTHERTON. — I cannot consent to the amendment. A man might remove from a 10*l.* to a 20*l.* house, and yet lose his title to vote because he was not a rated inhabitant. Now, a man might be nine months in his house, and not be rated.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — I must oppose this amendment. I have no doubt that the Honourable Gentleman has the bonâ fide intention to carry into effect the purpose he has alluded to; but the proviso he proposes would not have that effect.

Mr. C. BULLER. — I would ask any man whether, after a voter has been ascertained to possess that amount of property and intelligence contemplated by the Reform Act, it is fair that you should make his removal a criterion by which to alter his right of voting? I, for one, participate fully in the complaints that have been made of the partial operation of this Bill, and I cannot see why the principle which is considered applicable to boroughs should not extend to counties. Before I sit down, I wish to make one remark, which, I am sure, will be approved of by every man of liberal sentiments. It is with extreme satisfaction that I have heard every Member of the Government who has spoken to-night, declare his approbation of this measure; for it is, to a certain extent, an enlargement of the franchise, and, in consequence, an abandonment of the principle of finality. I do, therefore, particularly rejoice to find the Bill supported by the whole of the Government.

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — I appeal to my Honourable Friend who introduced this measure, whether my approbation of it is anything new? and whether I did not state to him that he would have the concurrence of every Member of her Majesty's Government?

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — Much less can it be supposed that there is any thing new on my part in approving this measure; for, some time ago, I introduced a Bill upon the same subject.

Mr. WAKLEY. — Quite true, — there has been nothing new in all this; the doctrine of "finality" has not been thrown overboard. The principle of the Bill is the same as that introduced by the Honourable and Learned Attorney General five years ago. Now, I believe it was not the intention of the framers of the Reform Bill that persons removing should lose their right of voting. What right have you to deprive a man, one year, of the right which he acquired the preceding year by a compliance with your law? I trust the Honourable Member will withdraw his proviso, and not press the committee to a division. His party is exceedingly small; and, as the better part of valour is discretion, I think the Honourable Member will be wise in not insisting upon his motion.

The gallery was then cleared, but no division took place.

The House resumed; Bill reported, without amendment. On the question, "That the Bill be read a third time to-morrow," —

The ATTORNEY GENERAL said: — I beg to suggest to the Honourable Member for Ipswich, that it would be better to appoint a more distant day than to-morrow for the third reading, to prevent the possibility of its being said that the Bill was smuggled through the House.

Mr. GIBSON. — I do not think that the Bill has any very inveterate enemies, and I have no objection to postpone the third reading till Monday.

Bill to be read a third time on Monday next.

WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I beg leave to move, "That, towards raising the supply granted to her Majesty, the several duties on sugar and molasses now imposed, and the bounties allowed thereon, be further continued." I take this opportunity of stating that it is not the intention of her Majesty's Government to propose any alteration in the duties or drawback.

Mr. EWART. — I must express my regret that there is to be no reduction in the sugar duties. I did hope that some progress would have been made, this year, in the reduction of those duties, in compliance with the wishes and expectations of a large portion of the mercantile community. Considering how little has yet been done towards placing those duties on a proper footing, I must say the subject calls for the most serious attention of the House.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I must protest against the interpretation put by the Honourable Member for Wigan upon what has been already done in the reduction of the sugar duties. I am old enough to recollect the proceedings in this House during the last twenty years; and, unquestionably, for sixteen years of that time, there has not been one subject more discussed or debated than the equalisation of the duties upon East India and West India produce. I rejoice that it was in my power to propose an equalisation of those duties, and, though so long a matter of contest, it is now the settled law of the land. With respect to the bounty on the export of sugar, that, also, has been a matter of grave and serious consideration, and I was enabled to introduce a measure which gave considerable relief on that subject. I therefore think the Honourable Member for Wigan has not fairly estimated what has been already done relative to the sugar duties.

Mr. MARK PHILIPS. — I think there is great danger that we shall be driven out of foreign markets, unless there be an assimilation of our duties on sugar with the sugar duties of foreign states. I would certainly recommend alterations in these duties. I think that the state of trade with the Brazils particularly calls for some alteration, since, at present, it is hardly possible to obtain a return for cargoes shipped to that country.

Mr. EWART. — On a future day I shall call the attention of the House to the expediency of relaxing the duties on East India sugar, and of admitting it to come into competition, to a much greater extent than it does at present, with West India sugar. I shall also call the attention of the House to the propriety of introducing foreign sugars.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I have no hesitation in saying that a reconsideration of the sugar duties might be entered upon advantageously to the state as a matter of revenue, and to the consumer in the price of sugar. But my Honourable Friend must be quite aware of the difficulties which would attend the subject; arising, first, from the claims of the colonies of this country to a preference, — on which I do not pronounce any opinion; and, in the second place, from the peculiar state of the Brazils with respect to the slave trade; because, when it is known that, at the present moment, the Brazils furnish a great market for slaves, and, therefore, give encouragement to the slave trade, it behoves the House to pause before giving support to that trade by affording an additional market to the producer of slave labour.

Mr. THORNELY. — It is vain to expect that keeping up prohibitory duties on sugar will have any effect in putting down slavery. It appears to me particularly absurd to use such an argument for excluding the produce of the Brazils, when this country is so largely dependent on the cotton and tobacco of the slave states of America.

Resolution to be reported to-morrow; committee to sit again on Friday.

CANADIAN PRISONERS.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I rise, pursuant to the notice which I gave yesterday, to present a petition from certain Canadian prisoners who are at present in custody in this country. They complain of having been unlawfully condemned to be transported to a penal colony; and I feel it to be my duty to call the attention of her Majesty's Government to the circumstances of the petitioners' case. In bringing the subject under your Lordships' notice, I cannot do better than quote the statement of the petitioners themselves; for I never saw a more lucid, a more clear, or a more perspicuous statement of facts. With one of the petitioners — Mr. Parker — I have had some communication; and I have reason to believe that that individual has filled a most respectable station in society. With regard to others, with whom I have had no correspondence, I understand that they, also, are persons of respectability. The petitioners state that they were committed, in the latter end of the year 1837, upon a charge of high treason. Parker, and the greater number of the petitioners, were in prison on the charge of treasonable practices before any outbreak took place; and therefore they could not have been actively connected with the insurrection. Others of them, some weeks after the matter came to the issue of open force, surrendered to a gentleman of the name of Head, under the impression that they should receive an unconditional pardon. It was found, however, that the Governor did not possess the power to grant pardon in cases of treason; whereupon an Act was passed in the province of Upper Canada, enabling him to grant pardon to those who should confess their offence, accompanied by such conditions as he might think proper to affix to that pardon. The petitioners state that, while in prison under duresse, and suffering great distress from the rigour of their confinement, and the extreme severity of a Canadian winter, they were informed that an Act had been passed (the existence of which they only knew through casual information) which was represented to them as an Act to enable the Governor to pardon treasonable offences; but they most positively aver — and they challenge any proof, if such proof can be adduced, to the contrary — that they were not, at the same time, informed of the conditions which the Act authorised the Governor to exact from those to whom he might be pleased to extend pardon. Here were men in prison suffering under the restraints of what the law calls duresse, and suffering, also, from the extreme rigours of a severe American winter; and, while thus situated, they were told by some one or other that an Act had been passed enabling the Governor to pardon them for the commission of any offences, which they might choose to confess; but they were not told, as they ought to have been, at the same time, that the Governor was enabled by that Act to annex to his pardon, consequent on their confession, any conditions whatsoever. If they confessed the crime whereof they were accused, they were assured that they would receive pardon; but they did not know that any conditions would be annexed to that pardon. They were thus induced to petition the Governor; but they were not at all aware of the penal consequences of such confession. They were, in the first instance, apprised that an Act was passed under which they might receive pardon; but they were not apprised of this power of annexing conditions thereto. They were told, in fact, that if they made a confession, they should receive pardon, and, as they supposed, unconditionally; — for the power which was given to the Governor to impose conditions was suppressed. The petitioners say that, listening to garbled statements, to misrepresentations in law and in fact, they were induced to petition for pardon. In their case, the suppression of information was as fatal as if a fiction had been invented, and an absolute lie told to them. The petitioners allege that, under these circumstances, they did petition, and they did confess; and they were afterwards treated, not according to the law as it had been announced to them, but according to the law as it had been concealed from them, — by conditions being annexed to their pardon, of the existence of which they were completely ignorant. And when and where did they hear of those conditions? In Canada? In Montreal? On the passage? On landing? In London? In Newgate? When they came up for judgment? No; but, for the first time, they became acquainted with these conditions when, on the floor of the Queen's Bench, they heard the warrant read on which they had been transferred from Upper to Lower Canada, and from the latter province to Liverpool, whence they were, by habeas corpus, brought up to London. Such is the outline of their case. The petitioners state that they never were arraigned, never tried, never convicted, never sentenced; and it was admitted by the Queen's Attorney General, and by the Bench, that they could not be considered as convicts. That fact ran through the whole of the argument in the Queen's Bench and in the Exchequer. The petitioners state that the penal settlement of New South Wales is intended for convicted criminals; and that they, not coming within that description of persons, are not liable to be confined in that colony under the 6th of George IV. The petitioners further observe that, if the duresse under which they are placed do not render their confession void, still the law of England does not admit of transportation on confession, unaccompanied by arraignment, and by acquiescence on the part of the parties accused. In the judgment which was given in their case, the Bench said that,—

Looking to the argument, it appeared that the prisoners had been indicted for high treason committed in Canada, and that they had confessed. But, under that confession, they were not liable to transportation to Botany Bay, but might be tried for treason in England; that they were then in the custody of the gaoler of Liverpool, and could not plead their pardon; but that it was to be inferred that the Government would take proper measures to have them prosecuted for high treason in England.

The judges thus threw upon the Government the ascertainment of this matter of law,—whether those prisoners were liable to be transported, or not? and if not, whether they should be tried for high treason, here? The petitioners declare that the pardon never was agreed to by them, and that the terms of such pardon were not known by them till judgment was given on the return to the writ of habeas corpus in the Courts of Queen's Bench and Exchequer. They state, that although they never gave their consent to the pardon, and, although they renounced it, still they have reason to believe that an intention exists, on the part of Government, to send them to Botany Bay, as if they had been regularly tried and convicted, or as if they had accepted the pardon, knowing the conditions that were annexed to it. Government is thus taking advantage of a confession, procured by duresse — or, as the law calls it, by force and fraud. This is the first time in the history of English law, in which a prisoner was not allowed to plead. It is the first time when, forcibly and against his will, an attempt was made to remove a man from England, who is not a prisoner under any Transportation Act, passed by the British Legislature. The petitioners proceed to set forth the evils which will arise from the abuse of the power thus asserted, and the grievances under which they labour, in consequence of the exercise of that power in their case. They therefore call on your Lordships to correct the law, so as to afford protection to those persons who are about to be forcibly removed, by the Government, from this country, without due proceedings being had at law; that those persons shall be allowed a legal trial; and, finally, that your Lordships shall provide, by law, that the returns to writs of habeas corpus shall be accompanied by some verification of the facts set out, and all documents connected with the committal of persons on whose behalf the writ of habeas corpus is sued out. I can, myself, answer for the accuracy of the documents referred to in the petition. As to the confession of the petitioners, — the suppression of an important point — the duresse under which they were placed when pardon was offered to them, and the conditions which were annexed to it, — these are matters with respect to which the petitioners challenge inquiry, and of which I, myself, know nothing. As to introducing any declaratory law, with reference to the operation of the Habeas Corpus Act in this country, I am relieved from the necessity of making any proposition of that nature by the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, when, to the astonishment of the country, — to the astonishment, I believe, of the court itself, — that extraordinary gloss was, for the first time since the reign of Charles, attempted to be put forward by the counsel for the Crown, at the time that the case of the petitioners was discussed. For the first time, but in vain, they attempted to put forward that gloss, which, if it had been allowed to prevail, would have torn up by the roots the security which is afforded to the liberty of the subject by the Habeas Corpus Act. I was astonished when that attempt was made, considering that we were well on in the 19th century, after a century and a half of experience, when all judges, sitting single, sitting in chambers, sitting at nisi prius, or more solemnly sitting in banco, — when the authority of all the text writers on the laws and constitution of England — when all the dicta, decisions, and legal authorities — ran in a directly contrary course, — when that protecting law had been made the general theme of panegyric, — when it was looked upon as setting the seal of glory on our name and nation; — considering all this, I was, indeed, astonished that at such a period an attempt should have been made, by putting forward an untenable proposition, to tear up by one of its roots — that root which had struck most deeply into our soil — the liberties of the people of England. The attempt of the Attorney General met with the fate which it so well deserved: he was heard; for there is no proposition so monstrous that can be made, no doctrine so tyrannical that can be broached, no point of law so utterly in the face of all law that can be attempted to be established before the judges, that they are not doomed to hear urged, and bound with patience to listen to. But the Court was never guilty of the gross absurdity of making itself responsible for this new-fangled doctrine, by calling on the other party, the prisoners, to answer to the argument. The Court, at once, without a moment's delay, — without the adjournment of a quarter of an hour to look into the statute, much less into the books, — unanimously rejected the learned counsel's exposition, and decreed that the Habeas Corpus Act should stand as it had hitherto stood, and at once stated that there was no shadow of foundation for this new, tyrannical, and monstrous interpretation. Therefore these prisoners have not to call on your Lordships to declare that the Habeas Corpus Act, hitherto the security of their liberties, is no longer waste paper; for it would have been waste paper if that gloss had been allowed to be put on it which was attempted. The Court of Queen's Bench have saved your Lordships the ignominy (I may call it) of having to declare, at the end of a century and a half, that an Act passed in the time of Charles II. to secure the liberty of the subject is unavailable now to secure the person! But your Lordships have a case, here, well deserving of consideration; and I hope you will think well before you listen to the construction of other Acts of Parliament, coming from the same quarter from which proceeded that construction of the statute of Charles II. which met with the signal discomfiture I have stated, by the Court of Queen's Bench, before whom the boldness was exhibited of putting forward such an exposition. I would have my Noble Friends well to consider, when they look at what they have before them. They have not a shadow of authority for this proceeding; all the authorities are the other way. They are left entirely to trust to the opinion of the Crown lawyer, the Attorney General, the discomfited inventor of a novel construction of the Habeas Corpus Act — of him, against whose construction of that Act the Court of Queen's Bench gave a unanimous, but I say, an indignant judgment, — upon his authority it is, if at all, they are about to decide that by law they are entitled to transport these prisoners. I would, therefore, not have them to think twice, but many, many times, before they adopt that construction of the law. They have no judicial authority for it; I have reason to believe they will get none; I have reason to believe that they will get an opinion to the contrary, if they have any means of asking it: I have reason to believe that, if the Court of Exchequer had been pressed to decide that point, which they could not decide upon, I have reason to suspect they would not have got an opinion that would have legalised that transportation. That is my view of the matter. I have still more reason to suspect that they would not have got the opinion of anything like a large proportion of the judges to that effect. But these are conjectures about the question, with regard to which I shall give no further account than to state, that so far as I have examined the case, and so far as some Learned Friends of mine with whom I have conferred have examined it, we are of opinion that the Government has no right to transport these men; that if they transport them, an act utterly illegal, in the teeth of the law, will be perpetrated by them. Nevertheless, the opinion of a Crown lawyer, — even of one discomfited so signally and so recently, — the opinion of that Crown lawyer is always deserving of very great deference; and on that opinion it may be thought prudent and safe to act. If so, I may remind the Government of another circumstance, — and it is the last to which I shall call attention. There were many, many men, taken prisoners with arms in their hands, in the height of rebellion, in open commission of high treason, fighting against the subjects—ay, fighting against the troops — of the Crown; every one of these has had the benefit of the amnesty — every one. Two or three of these persons, on the other hand, have come in under Sir Francis Head's amnesty, under a general profession of pardon; but they complain that there is annexed to that a condition of transportation for life, which, if they had known, they would never have accepted; they would have remained in the woods. They now ask to be tried. They say, "You have annexed a condition to our pardon; try us, and let a jury of our country decide our punishment — we don't care whether in Canada or in England, but try us." Why should these poor nine men be sent to New South Wales, while all those who were taken with arms in their hands,—flagrante bello civili — every one of them, have been pardoned — not one of them has been punished? And these nine, all but two or three, were physically incapable of having arms in their hands, because they were in prison. Why should they not have the benefit of an amnesty which has thus been granted? By accident, the guilty have escaped. I shall now leave the case with her Majesty's Government, in whose hands the fate of these prisoners rests.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.—Consistently with my duty, it is impossible for me to make any comment on the petition which has been read to your Lordships by the Noble and Learned Lord, for this reason — many of the allegations it contains are under the consideration of her Majesty's Government at the present moment. No decision has been yet come to on the subject. I only entreat your Lordships to recollect that what has been stated and read in the petition, are the statements of parties deeply interested, who, of course, make the best of their own case. That case has been very ably commented on by the Noble and Learned Lord, and has been very elaborately stated by some one for them. Many of its allegations having come, for the first time, under the consideration of her Majesty's Government; they require considerable investigation, some reference, and much advice; and therefore, in the present stage of the business, I am sure your Lordships will perceive that it would not be consistent to say more about it.

Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CLERKS OF THE PEACE BILL.

LORD REDESDALE having moved the second reading of this Bill, —

LORD PORTMAN said: — As this measure is, in my opinion, likely to create many grievances, I hope your Lordships will not agree to it. A lord lieutenant of Worcester has left the kingdom without appointing a vice; and the object of the present Bill is, to provide a remedy in such a case, by enabling the county magistrates to appoint a clerk of the peace. Under this Bill, the clerks of the peace are not only to be "able and sufficient," but "instructed and learned in the law of England." I have asked the meaning of these terms, but it is extremely difficult to determine what "a person learned in the law" means; it may mean an attorney. If your Lordships would pass a clause to the effect that no lord lieutenant should leave the kingdom without appointing a vice, it would render useless this Bill.

LORD REDESDALE. — I admit that, probably, this Bill may never be acted on. One case only has arisen, in a number of years, which calls for such a measure; and the Bill, to which I cannot conceive any real objection, is brought forward to meet such a contingency.

LORD BROUGHAM. — This Bill, in my opinion, goes a great deal too far. It gives the magistrates of a county the power of appointing the clerk of the peace, though the lord lieutenant may be living in his own house in the next county. Now, I think it my duty to remind your Lordships that the best grounds for general laws are not single cases.

The EARL of HARDWICKE.—With the small amount of patronage which the lords lieutenants possess, I do not see why your Lordships should not allow them to nominate a vice, without that power being in the hands of the magistrates of counties. Upon the whole, I think this Bill aims a blow at the patronage which lords lieutenants possess, without any advantage being conferred on the public.

The EARL of HAREWOOD. — I think that the lord lieutenant might be compelled, on a penalty or otherwise, not to leave his county without appointing a vice lieutenant. I see no objection to that.

LORD PORTMAN. — I must confess that this Bill appears to me to be incapable of amendment. I shall therefore take the sense of the House on the motion.

The DUKE of RICHMOND. — The necessity for the Bill has arisen out of the fault of Government, in not removing the lord lieutenant of Worcestershire, and appointing another who would have performed what was required.

The question, that "now" stand part of the motion, resolved in the negative; and Bill ordered to be read a second time on this day six months.

CORN LAWS.

LORD KINNAIRD presented a petition for the repeal of, — of inhabitants of Auchterarder. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

RULES OF PROCEEDINGS (BOROUGH COURTS) BILL.

LORD DENMAN. — I beg to present to your Lordships an Act for regulating the borough courts of England and Wales. In the Bill on this subject, which was sent to the House of Commons, there was a defect which was suffered to remain, and which, therefore, renders it requisite to bring in a new measure. This being the case, there is no necessity for considering whether the amendments made by that House may or may not be proper. I would therefore submit to your Lordships the propriety of introducing the present Bill, which corrects the defect; and I trust that the House of Commons will allow it to pass in the form in which it will go to them. I now beg leave to move that the Commons' amendments be taken into consideration this day six months.

Agreed to; and Bill read a first time, and ordered to be printed.

SCOTCH CHURCH.

The EARL of GALLOWAY presented a petition against the further endowment of, — of inhabitants of East Kilbride. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT ACT.

EARL STANHOPE. — I beg leave to present a petition from the clergymen of Horsmonden, Lamberhurst, Brenchley, and Goudhurst, in Kent, lying in three different unions, comprising 8000 souls. The petitioners express their hope that a searching inquiry will be made to discover whether the power vested in the Poor Law Commissioners has not been exercised in an arbitrary and capricious manner; they press the necessity of dispensing with the assistant commissioners, and the saving of expenditure to be effected thereby; they are anxious that all the provisions of the Poor Law Amendment Act shall be carefully examined, with a view to mitigate the rigour of its effects on the poor, whose interests it ought to protect; they are especially desirous that the bastardy clauses shall be got rid of altogether, for, say they, it is most unjust to visit the punishment on one only, and that the weaker, particeps criminis; they condemn also the hardship of throwing the expense of maintaining the child upon the mother, — and declare that these regulations have, it is to be feared, greatly increased the dreadful crime of child murder, without diminishing or checking profligacy; they esteem the refusal of relief at their homes, to deserving objects, a great hardship — it is in effect to punish poverty as a crime; and they pray that discretionary powers may be vested in the boards of guardians to relieve such cases as, on investigation, may seem to them to call for relief. I only wish these sentiments were universally entertained by the ministers of the established church, and then no apprehension need be entertained for the security of that body. I need not say that I agree entirely with the reverend petitioners, and especially as to what they say of the bastardy clauses: and here I would observe of my Noble and Learned Friend (Lord Brougham), — without, however, meaning any disrespect to him, — that he seems to be one of those who strain at a gnat and swallow a camel; for I think it is rather remarkable, after all that your Lordships heard the other day from the Noble and Learned Lord of the depravity and demoralisation of beer-houses, that the Noble and Learned Lord does not dilate upon the demoralisation caused by the Poor Law Amendment Act. I maintain that the bastardy enactments have, in many cases, operated to give perfect impunity to the seducer; while they have caused, but too often, the suicide of the female, or the murder of the offspring. I distinctly charge all this on the New Poor Law. But this is not all; I have received a communication from a gentleman residing in the neighbourhood of these petitioners, who states that the workhouse of the Tunbridge union never had contained many more than 400 persons. But in last year, or rather from the 1st of February to the 31st of December, what was the number of deaths, does the House think? No less than 47 — that is to say, upwards of 11 per cent. This is the mortality of a workhouse under this system — 11 per cent. a-year, — while the individual to whom I have referred states, that in his own parish the mortality, on the whole, is only 2¼. A respectable person has informed me that the average number of persons in the workhouse of Horsmonden, last year, was 200, and of deaths 34, making 17 per cent. Now, I do think that it is absolutely necessary that a full and fair inquiry into these cases should take place, and that it should not be conducted by assistant commissioners, secretaries, and their dependents.

Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

EARL STANHOPE. — I now beg leave to present the petition of Thomas Coombs, which I read to your Lordships some days since. Perhaps, as it is a valuable document, and your Lordships may have forgotten some of the statements, it may be advisable to read it again.

LORD BROUGHAM. — Oh, no! God forbid! I hope my Noble Friend will have no objection to postpone this petition to another night. Surely, one petition is enough for one night. My Noble Friend has founded a lecture on the poor laws, which he seems determined not to allow to drop; but I hope he will now allow us a respite from a second on the same night. I would suggest to my Noble Friend that it would be a much fairer course to move at once for a repeal of the Poor Law Amendment Act, or to wait till the promised Bill for t he alteration of that measure comes before your Lordships, instead of attacking the general administration of the law from particular instances of alleged misconduct.

EARL STANHOPE. — This is the first time, during a parliamentary career of thirty years, I ever heard the presentation of a petition designated a lecture.

LORD BROUGHAM. — My Noble Friend forgets that that was the expression he himself made use of last year, — having declared that it was his intention to institute "a course of lectures on the poor law."

EARL STANHOPE. — I am not aware that any course I can take would be fairer than that which I am now pursuing, although it pleases my Noble Friend on this, as on all other occasions, to be facetious. I have lived on intimate terms with a man whose memory I shall ever revere, — who was one of the brightest ornaments of this House, — the late Lord Eldon. In one of the last conversations I had with that great man, who was snatched from your Lordships, to the infinite and irreparable loss of his country, Lord Eldon remarked, when speaking of the expediency of attempting the repeal of the New Poor Law, that "nothing could be done till the country was ready for it, which it would soon be." That was one of the reasons which induced me to postpone any general motion upon the subject; but, although postponed, according to a French proverb, it will not therefore be lost. In the mean time, I would beg leave to read to your Lordships an affidavit, which contains an interesting statement relative to the administration of the law in the parish of Wimborne. It is as follows: —

I, Anne White, wife of Silas White, of the parish of Wimborne Minster, do solemnly and sincerely declare, that in January, 1837, I applied to Mr. Henry Bartlett, one of the guardians of the parish of Wimborne, for relief.

I had then been confined about a month with my seventh child, and had no victuals nor money for myself, husband, and seven children. We were all starving, my husband not having been able to get regular work for some months. My landlady, Mrs. Wareham, accompanied me to Mr. Bartlett; when I told him how distressed we all were, and begged of him to give me something for my family (in all nine of us) to eat, for we were hungry enough to eat each other.

Mr. Bartlett said, he would not give me a farthing, if it was to save my life; and that I had better go home and make a pie of some of my children, and begin with this infant in my arms. Mrs. Wareham then asked him how he would like to see his daughter made into a pie, and whether he did not think that I had the same love for my children as he had for his? I then went away, without having any relief given me. And I make this solemn declaration, conscientiously believing the same to be true, and by virtue of the provisions of an Act made and passed in the sixth year of the reign of his late Majesty, entitled, "An Act to repeal an Act of the present Session of Parliament, entitled, 'An Act for the more effectual Abolition of Oaths and Affirmations taken and made in various Departments of the State, and to substitute Declarations in lieu thereof; and for the more entire Suppression of voluntary and extrajudicial Oaths and Affidavits, and to make other Provisions for the Abolition of unnecessary Oaths.'"

And I certify that the above declaration was read over and explained to the said Anne White, in my presence, previously to her putting her signature or mark thereto, and that she fully understood the same.

ISAAC FRYER, a Master Extraordinary in Chancery.

Now, as regards the present petitioner, he states that he has a wife and nine children, seven of whom are under sixteen years of age, and one only seven months old. Last summer, he earned 12*s.* a-week, but, for fifteen weeks previous to his addressing this petition to the House, was able to obtain no work. He applied for relief to the guardians of Westbourne union, of which he was an acknowledged pauper, but was refused, and directed to go to Portsea union, where he applied and was also refused. Having, at last, reached the degree of suffering which the assistant commissioner for Hampshire gives as the description of qualifying destitution, and thus become entitled, in the opinion of the Portsea board, to relief, he had for his family 4*s.* and three gallons of bread weekly; and for himself medical relief, and such nourishment as the surgeon prescribed. And, when he had recovered sufficiently to bear the journey, he was, with his family, removed to Westbourne workhouse, where they were first locked up in cold damp rooms, as if they had been guilty of some crime, and afterwards separated from each other. Thus insult is added to injury in the treatment of the poor. I now beg to move that this petition do lie upon the table.

The DUKE of RICHMOND. — With respect to the present petition, to which the Noble Earl, through the medium of the newspapers, has given a most extensive circulation, it is signed with the mark of Thomas Coombs, and witnessed by the Rev. Mr. Dewdney. It is evident that the petition, which is remarkably well drawn up, is the composition of Mr. Dewdney, and not of the petitioner. In anything I am going to say, I wish particularly to guard myself against being supposed to make any attack on that reverend gentleman, who, I believe, from all I have heard, is a very humane and very good man; but, somewhat like my Noble Friend, on the subject of the poor law, has taken a twist, and ——

EARL STANHOPE. — A what?

The DUKE of RICHMOND. — A twist; and cannot hear the question discussed without loss of temper, and having his judgment warped by his prejudices against the new system. The reverend gentleman has acted well by putting his signature to this petition, so that it cannot be said that it comes before your Lordships under false pretences. Coombs is a man who has been working in the Portsea union as a digger of brick earth, for 12*s.* a-week. His eldest daughter, who is sixteen years of age, is only able to earn 1*s.* 9*d.* a-week by making stays; and his next daughter is fourteen years old. Now, what I complain of is, that the man should have neglected to place his daughters, when they arrived at such an age, out at service. It is very easy for girls of their years to go to service, there being always a demand for them. No farmer can be expected to give wages large enough to maintain such a family; and, besides, to retain the eldest children at home at their years, is only to bring them up in idleness and light habits. I think that persons, situated as this man is, ought, in all cases, to put their children out to service; which, besides enabling them to earn something, fits them to become wives and mothers themselves. This man applied to the board of the Westbourne union for relief, and was told that he must go to the relieving officer of the union within which he resided. He was taken before a magistrate, examined as to his proper parish, and ordered to be removed thither; but, in consequence of the man's becoming ill, the execution of the order was suspended. When the man got well, he came to Westbourne, and arrived when the board of guardians was sitting. Here I will put it to the Rev. Mr. Dewdney himself, or any other gentleman, however strong may be his prejudices, to say whether the chairman and members of this board are not as respectable and humane men, and exemplary in the discharge of their duties, as can anywhere be found? I will venture to say that the farmers of the neighbourhood give their labourers as good wages as any in the country,— as good as my Noble Friend himself gives. The board was told that the man came from a place at a distance, and ordered him to be admitted into the workhouse; which is not, as the petition represents it, fitted up like a gaol, for it has no iron bars at the windows.

EARL STANHOPE. — The inmates are locked up.

The DUKE of RICHMOND. — I am ready to meet my Noble Friend on that point. The man was taken to the probationary ward. If the parties were not locked up, it would be impossible, among the lower classes, of seaport towns especially, to prevent the introduction and spread of infectious diseases. The man was put into the male side of the probationary ward, and his children into the female side. Instantly on this being done, a fire was lighted, and dinner provided for him. The doctor was sent for; he arrived soon after, and ordered him to be taken into the infirmary. The man had not been there more than an hour and a half, when his wife told the matron she wished to see her husband. The request was instantly complied with; she was taken into the infirmary, where her husband said he was very comfortable, and had nothing to complain of; on which she went back to sleep in her own part of the house. If they had been in a county infirmary, can my Noble Friend suppose that the woman would have been allowed to remain with her sick husband all night? It should be observed that the complaint of the petitioner as to separation would have applied as well to any other infirmary. On the following morning the woman again asked to see her husband, and was taken immediately, as before, to see him. I should like my Noble Friend to ask Mr. Dewdney whether he would give his word of honour as a gentleman, that he heard the statements With regard to the declaration which my Noble Friend has read to your Lordships, which he has put into the petition from the lips of the individual? I wish to ask Mr. Dewdney that question, as I am certain that that gentleman is a man of too high honour to reply in the affirmative if such be not the case. I do not believe that Mr. Dewdney took the statements from the lips of the petitioner, but from those of his wife. I object to the legality of the proceeding. I contend that the magistrate who took that declaration is liable to be fined for a misdemeanour. The intention of the Legislature, in altering the law on this subject, was expressly to prevent voluntary and gratuitous oaths; and the magistrate in question might just as well have taken a declaration about the ingredients of a pot of blacking, as the one which the Noble Earl has read. Now, I know for a fact, that the petitioner was heard to say, by one who was an inmate of the workhouse at the time, that he should like to spend a week in it very much; that his wife said that she would not have come to the union at all if she had not hoped the guardians would have given her out-door relief; and that, if they had, she hoped to have got assistance from other persons also. I deny that the rooms of the workhouse, as asserted in the petition, are cold and damp. I wish Mr. Dewdney had inquired a little more fully into its state. The guardians would be happy to allow the reverend gentleman to examine the workhouse. I will only add, from my knowledge of the wages and habits of meritorious labourers, that those who are determined to be provident, and take every means in their power to bring up their children in industrious habits, will always be able to rear a family. I know persons in the same situation as the petitioner, and with as large families, who have money in the savings bank.

LORD WYNFORD. — I wish to say a few words on the present petition, as there are allegations in it into which I think that the House is bound in duty to inquire. It is evidently impossible that a man and his wife, with a family of nine children, can be supported on a sum of 12*s.* a-week.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — That has nothing to do with the poor law.

LORD WYNFORD. — The Noble Viscount will allow me to say that it has to do with the poor law. I am, at present, observing on the petition. I cannot say two things at one time. I maintain that it is impossible that eleven persons can be supported on a sum of 12*s.* a-week.

The DUKE of RUTLAND. — The Noble and Learned Lord has forgotten that the eldest child receives 4*s.* a-week, and that the eldest daughter receives 1*s.* 6*d.* a-week for staymaking; so that the man has 17*s.* 6*d.*, and not 12*s* a-week, for the support of his family.

EARL STANHOPE. — Occasionally.

LORD WYNFORD. — I do hope that no more petitions of this kind will be presented. It is not the way in which your Lordships can get at the truth. My Noble Friend near me tells one story, and my Noble Friend opposite (the Duke of Richmond) tells another. What positive conclusion can your Lordships come to under such circumstances? How are you to know whether the statement of the Noble Earl be correct, or whether that of the Noble Duke be incorrect? It is a mere idle waste of time to bandy these charges and these defences about on the mere presentation of petitions. If the guardians have acted as this petition states, it is clearly an indictable offence; but if they have acted as the board of guardians assert that they have acted, then the board have performed their duty with great humanity. If the petitioner died upon the snow, then the reverend gentleman who drew up this petition has stated the law correctly, when he says that such neglect would have been manslaughter at least, if it had not been murder, on the part of the relieving officer. Now, it is my deliberate opinion that if the reverend gentleman would bring a case of that sort before a jury, it would do more to stop the present abuses in the administration of the poor laws than all the petitions which may be presented to your Lordships against them. If the parties indicted were acquitted, the public would no longer be abused with these stories; if they were convicted, their convictions would prove, more clearly than anything else could do, the existence of the alleged abuses. If a man neglect his duty as relieving officer, and if, in consequence of his neglect, the poor either suffer in health, or are put to any inconvenience to which, legally, they ought not to be subjected, —as, for instance, in one case of which I was, myself, cognizant, where an individual was ordered to travel 100 miles, before he could obtain relief, — there can be no doubt whatever that matters of that sort might be investigated upon an indictment, and that they might, even, be made the subject of civil action also. Now, such a mode of proceeding would bring the point at issue to a speedy termination; and it would have this advantage, besides, —that it would be clearly understood and shortly decided. I could mention many cases of hardship; but I will content myself by calling your Lordships' attention to one, which occurred in Suffolk, and which was proved before your Lordships' committee last year. A relieving officer walked into a house, where he found a poor man of the age of ninety lying in his bed in the last state of infirmity and destitution. Now, when this case came before the committee, I asked the officer in question why he did not allow this man proper relief? He answered, "I intended to do something, but there was not time." "Was not time!" said I; "why not?" The reply was, "The man died." "How long did he live?" — "Five days." "So you thought proper to leave a human being in the state that you, yourself, have admitted this poor man to have been in, without even calling the attention of the board of guardians to the case, without permitting him to have a change of linen, or without doing one thing to relieve the wretched sufferer?"

My Lords, would it not have been better to have presented an indictment, rather than a petition, against this officer? If an indictment had been presented, and had been followed up by a conviction, it would have prevented this monster from remaining in his situation as relieving officer. I hope, therefore, that in future, parties who complain of abuses under the poor laws, instead of petitioning, will punish, by criminal proceedings, the individuals whom they can prove guilty of these malversations. For my own part, I am not an enemy, generally speaking, to the present poor laws. There are many things in them of which I approve highly; but there are also many things of which I disapprove as strenuously; — for instance, I am not in favour of the bastardy clauses, which have been productive of great injury to the country already, and which will be, I fear, productive of still more. It is not my intention to renew the Bill which I introduced on this subject last Session, though I think that measure, and one even still larger, is required by the circumstances of the country. I am too old and too infirm to enter upon such a task, now. But a new Bill, I trust, will shortly be brought in by my Noble and Learned Friend opposite (Earl Stanhope); and then the three kings of Somerset House, as they have been called, will, of necessity, lose their thrones. If such a Bill be brought in, I hope that a clause will be introduced into it, by which the people of England will be placed on the same footing with the negroes in the West Indies. It is deemed consistent with British justice that stipendiary magistrates, quite independent of the planters, should legislate between the negroes and their employers. I therefore trust that there will be no objection to give to the poor of England some mode of appeal from the boards of guardians to an independent tribunal; as it is not fair to leave them entirely at the mercy of a board of guardians, who are generally their employers, and who must always relieve them out of their own pecuniary resources.

The DUKE of RICHMOND. — The petition alleges that this man, with his nine children, were all sent to the workhouse. Now, it appears, even from the statement of the Rev. Mr. Dewdney, that only eight of his children were sent there. The Noble Earl also admits that one of the man's children earns 4*s.* a-week, and that his eldest girl earns 1*s.* 7*d.* a-week by staymaking. He has, therefore, no right to argue this as a case where only 12*s.* a-week is the income of the man and his family. For my own part, I must say that I do everything in my power to influence the farmers to give good wages to their labourers, not only as a matter of fair dealing to the workmen, but also as a matter of economy to themselves. What I complain of is, that none of the denouncers of the present system of poor laws, and of its mode of administration, have ever ventured to present an indictment against any of the boards of guardians whom they abuse so lustily. Why does not the Noble Earl opposite, if he believes these charges, present a bill of indictment against the guardians of the Westbourne union? I challenge the Noble Earl to present such a bill against them. Why are they to be shown up, night after night, by the public press, at the suggestion of the Noble Earl, when they have no one present in this House to defend them? I ask the Noble Earl to prosecute those respectable gentlemen. On their part, I defy the Noble Earl to do his worst; but the Noble Earl knows well that prosecute them he cannot, for nothing wrong have they done. My Noble and Learned Friend says that there is no appeal from the decision of these boards of guardians. I think that I heard my Noble and Learned Friend speak of the three "dictators" who overrule the proceedings of these local boards. Those three "dictators," as my Noble and Learned Friend calls them, stand to the poor in this country in the same relation in which the stipendiary magistrates he speaks of stand to the negroes in the West Indies. They are not appointed by the ratepayers, but by the Government; and their regulations must have the sanction of the Secretary of State for the Home Department, or else they are invalid. I declare that if I had known of any instance of inhumanity occurring in the execution of this law, in the county of Sussex, I should have felt it to be my duty to prosecute, at my own expense, the party guilty of it. I recollect the case, in Suffolk, to which my Noble and Learned Friend has alluded; and I must say, that to me it appears that the overseer was right in law, though he was wrong in practice. The overseer, in that case, asked the man whether he would have a surgeon; the man said, No. Nevertheless, under all the circumstances of that case, I think that the relieving officer would have done his duty, better, if he had sent a surgeon to the man's house, — no matter whether he wished it or not. If the presentation of petitions of this kind is, as my Noble and Learned Friend has justly said, highly inconvenient, it is still more inconvenient to have quoted, on a sudden, cases which rest upon evidence that none of your Lordships have read for some time. I again challenge the Noble Earl to present an indictment against these guardians, if he really think they have been guilty of the conduct which he has imputed to them. Let him present it when and where he likes. Let him even put Mr. Dewdney into the jury-box, and I am sure that, when that reverend gentleman examines the whole matter calmly and carefully, he will agree with me in saying that the guardians of the Westbourne union have done nothing harsh towards this petitioner.

LORD WYNFORD. — The relieving officer, in the Suffolk case, walked into the house of the poor man, and saw with his own eyes his state of utter destitution. It was, therefore, his duty to relieve him, — for the law of England is founded on Christianity, which is itself a law of humanity. I repeat that, under the existing poor law, there is no appeal from the board of guardians, who at present exercise a power absolutely uncontrolled.

EARL STANHOPE. — The Noble Duke considers my reverend friend Mr. Dewdney to have the same "twist" on the New Poor Laws that I have? I am proud to say that I concur with my reverend friend Mr. Dewdney, with my reverend friend Mr. Bull, of Bradford, and with many other reverend gentlemen, in their statements respecting this atrocious law. But is it a logical conclusion on the part of the Noble Duke, to assume that, because Mr. Dewdney is mistaken as to the operation of the New Poor Laws, he is therefore mistaken as to the facts of the present case? Is it a logical conclusion to assume that the information contained in this petition was derived, not from the mouth of the petitioner himself, but from that of his wife? I know, not only that Mr. Dewdney received that statement from the petitioner himself, but also that he examined and cross-examined him closely as to every word that it contains. As soon as my reverend friend discovered that he had not given me correct information upon the earnings of the man's family, he communicated his discovery to me. I repeat, however, the statement, that, during fifteen weeks, the petitioner was without an opportunity of getting work; and that at last, nature being exhausted, he fell down in a fit before he got to Westbourne.

Digitized by Google

The DUKE of RICHMOND. — Then there is an end to the charge against the board of guardians at Westbourne; for you admit that this exhaustion and this prostration of the powers of his constitution took place before he asked them for relief.

EARL STANHOPE. — The poor man had then arrived at that state of suffering which, according to the declaration of the assistant commissioner for Hampshire, constituted a sufficient test of destitution, — for he was ready to die of starvation in the streets. I know persons in whose presence the atrocious, inhuman declaration, of which we complain, was made; and I am ready, if your Lordships please, to prove it at your bar. The Noble Duke may, perhaps, give another version of the story; but I should like to know whether the evidence on which that version rests did not come from persons liable to be warped by that spirit of intimidation to which reference has been made already in the course of the debate. My Noble and Learned Friend (Lord Wynford) seems to think that the presentation of petitions is unnecessary, and that that is not the best mode of leading to the investigation of such matters. But I contend that it is the duty of this House — which I trust your Lordships will never deviate from — to throw open, widely, your doors to receive the petitions of the people. My Noble and Learned Friend recommends the adoption of legal proceedings; but cases of this sort are so numerous, as well as flagrant and atrocious, that, if investigated in courts of law, no other business could possibly be proceeded with. But who is to bear the expense of such proceedings? Whilst protesting, as I always have done, against this execrable and unchristian enactment, I must own my objection to it does not depend on particular cases, — though these are as thick as leaves in autumn; and I am aware that I shall always be met with the answer, that, although the Bill may operate to the injury and oppression of individuals, still it has been productive of good. My objections, however, point to the principle of the Bill; and, whoever send their petitions to me, may depend on my discharging my duty by presenting them. It is for your Lordships to consider what course you will adopt; — whether you will not renew the committee of last Session, which might have been productive of good if it had been duly conducted, — not in the quibbling and pettifogging manner that it was managed in, — overloading the minutes with useless matter, and merely attempting to confound and confute the opinions of witnesses, — so that of their Report, after all this preparation, it might be said, nascitur ridiculus mus? Few persons would take the trouble to read, and none to present, a digest of such a document. I think it your Lordships' duty not only to receive, but patiently and deliberately to examine, every allegation in the petitions which are presented upon this important subject. I, at least, will discharge my duty with firmness, — at the same time giving, as I am bound in fairness to do, every opportunity in my power, to those who are affected by the allegations made in such petitions, of making what answer they can.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I do not rise for the purpose of prolonging this debate, being very much of opinion with the Noble and Learned Baron opposite (Lord Wynford), that, if your Lordships were to continue it for three hours later, you would not be likely to arrive at any more satisfactory conclusion, or more clear conviction in your own minds, than I apprehend you are already in possession of. But, as the Noble and Learned Lord has repeated the declaration made by the Noble Earl, which is altogether erroneous and injurious to the character of a person of the highest respectability, and who discharges the duties of the office he holds in the most exemplary manner, I cannot help reading to your Lordships that gentleman's own explanation of the expressions which have been attributed to him. The Noble Earl has attributed to the assistant poor law commissioner of the district, Colonel A'Court, the statement that a man had no right to relief until he had actually fallen down in the street dying from destitution, exhaustion, and inanition. Such a statement, when attributed to a person like Colonel A'Court, is altogether unlikely and improbable. But it never was used by him. His own account of the matter is this: —

As regards the expressions which Thomas Coombs has attributed to me, as my definition of destitution, — at this distance of time I cannot charge my memory with the exact words which I may have made use of; but I perfectly well recollect observing, on a discussion as to the relative duties of relieving officers and overseers, that it was very desirable that all out-door relief should be administered by the union officers, but that cases might occur in which it was absolutely necessary that an overseer should interfere. As an illustration, I may very possibly have cited the case of a wayfaring man suffering from exhaustion in the streets as one of many which the P[illegible] overseers were compelled to provide for, notwithstanding the appointment of a resident relieving officer. The question was not as to the interpretation of the term "destitution," but I had in my mind reference solely to such cases of emergency as parish officers were bound to take cognizance of in the absence of the paid officers of the union. It is hardly necessary for me to declare that I never for an instant intended to convey the impression "that a man must be ready to drop in the street before he could be legally entitled to parish relief."

Your Lordships will at once see the manner in which these expressions were used by Colonel A'Court. They were not intended as a definition of the situation to which a man must be reduced before he can claim relief, but as a statement of the case which would justify the parish officer in interfering, when otherwise he would not be justified in so doing in the absence of the paid officers of the union. The Noble Earl, therefore, who must have spoken inadvertently or upon misinformation, has evidently attributed the expression to Colonel A'Court in a sense it was never intended to bear.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON.—My Lords, I am very happy to hear the explanation which has been given by the Noble Viscount. I did not know the name of the assistant poor law commissioner to whom reference has been made; but knowing pretty well all those who fill that office in Hampshire, I was perfectly certain that none of them were capable of making use of such expressions as those which have been quoted on the present occasion. This, however, is only another example of that which has frequently come under our notice in this House;—I allude to the facility with which facts of this description are alleged in petitions against the Poor Law Commissioners and other parties, which, upon investigation, turn out to have little or no foundation in truth, and the evidence to which is as little confirmatory of the original statement as the circumstances which have been so satisfactorily explained by the Noble Viscount prove to be in relation to the charge against Colonel A'Court. I really think it would be very desirable if the Noble Earl would attend to the recommendation of my Noble and Learned Friend behind me (Lord Wynford), who has urged him to bring in a Bill to alter this law, and see what he can do in the way of its amendment. I have been long enough in Parliament to recollect that, before the present law passed, there were not less than half a dozen attempts made, by some of the greatest men this country ever produced, to amend the system of poor laws. Among others, one person for whom I know the Noble Earl entertained the greatest respect,—the late Mr. Pitt,—endeavoured to amend these laws, but failed,—and for a reason which, I believe, occasioned the failure of every attempt to alter them, until that which was successfully made within these five years, when the present Poor Law Amendment Act was passed, principally by the exertions of the Noble and Learned Lord (Lord Brougham), who was present at the commencement of this debate, but who has since left his place. The real truth of the matter was this;—that in every parish in the country there existed some abuses, I will venture to say, a hundred times greater than any of those which the Noble Earl has brought forward in any of those petitions, with which he entertains your Lordships upon every vacant day that presents itself. In every parish, I repeat, there were abuses; and, in each, abuses founded upon a different principle from those existing in some neighbouring parish; so that no law could be devised to remedy them,—for the measure which would apply to parish A, instead of removing the abuses existing in parish B, would only have tended to aggravate and render them intolerable. At length an Administration, of which the Noble Viscount was a member, took up the matter. There was a very general and searching inquiry into the whole state of the administration of the poor laws; the result of which was, that the present measure was arranged and produced to Parliament. It passed both Houses in a very short space of time, and, I believe, on the principle there was no division whatever, and hardly a difference of opinion, in this House; I believe there was none in the other House of Parliament, and very little difference of opinion was expressed upon any part of the details. With respect to the administration of the law, I have observed it in different parts of the country, and I must say that its administration has been entirely satisfactory, and most particularly to those parties who are likely to become its more immediate objects. That part of the law of which the Noble Earl and the Noble Baron behind him complain most,—namely, the existence of the Poor Law Commissioners,—is, in my opinion, the most important part of it. The truth of the matter is, that the abuses in the administration of the poor laws were so numerous, so various, and, at the same time, so inveterate, that it was absolutely impossible to get the better of them without the constitution of some central authority which should superintend the execution of the law,—taking care that it was duly administered, and that those intrusted with its execution in the country did not infringe upon its provisions. Such, I believe, was the object of the institution of those boards of guardians and commissioners. Every measure has been adopted to secure the publicity of the Reports, to enable Parliament to acquire a knowledge, at any time, of all their transactions in reference to any particular subject; and I must say that the part of the conduct of the Noble Earl that astonishes me most, is this; — that while he can, at any time, acquire the means of ascertaining the truth upon any given point which he takes up, — instead of moving for the production of the papers and correspondence, and finding out precisely what the real facts are, he goes into detail of all the allegations in a petition, producing exaggerated statements on the subject; and is thus guilty of all the injustice of doing an injury to the reputations of those persons whom he traduces.

The DUKE of RICHMOND. — I rise to move, — in order to afford the Noble Earl an opportunity of reply, — "That there be laid before the House a copy of examinations by the clerk of the Westbourne union in the case of Thomas Coombs, and a statement of the circumstances relating thereto." I will only say, in reference to the allegation which has been made by the Noble Earl as to the expensive character of proceedings in a court of law, that if the Noble Earl will consent to prosecute the Westbourne guardians, I will undertake to pay the whole of the expense, if they be found guilty, — on condition the Noble Earl will pay the whole of it, if they be acquitted.

EARL STANHOPE. — I really feel at a loss to conceive what notions of justice are entertained by the Noble Duke (the Duke of Wellington), when he complains that those worthy and excellent persons the Poor Law Commissioners are falsely calumniated and reviled, because those who suffer under the severity of their administration venture to call the attention of the Legislature to the circumstances of their case. I must also be allowed to say, in answer to another observation of the Noble Duke, that I am not a public prosecutor; nor, as I have repeatedly stated, do I rest my opposition to this accursed measure on individual cases, however aggravated they may be. The Noble Duke has referred to the various attempts which have been made to amend the poor laws. I deny that there was any failure on the part of that great Minister, whose memory I revere as the greatest statesman — without disparagement to any in modern times — whom this country ever produced, — whose councils I hope will always be followed, — and who, if he had been spared by Providence, would have preserved this country from those dangers which now encompass it on every side. The plan which that great Minister proposed, it should be recollected, was different as light is from darkness from the provisions of the Poor Law Amendment Act. In December, 1796, his system was brought forward. In the following year a variety of calamitous events occurred; and, amongst others, the suspension of cash payments by the Bank of England. Mr. Pitt's attention was naturally absorbed by these, and he did not find it possible to proceed with his Bill. But the measure so proposed cannot, therefore, be called a failure. The Noble Duke has called upon me to bring forward a Bill, similar to that introduced last Session by my Noble and Learned Friend (Lord Wynford), to amend the poor law. He has, no doubt, considered well in what respects the present Act should be amended; but I think the most convenient mode of discussing the subject would be — by resolutions, and not on the introduction of a Bill. I intend, therefore, to lay on the table the resolutions which I think desirable to be proposed, and which I shall move be printed for consideration on a future occasion. As to the expense of prosecuting the Westbourne guardians, I decline accepting the sort of "bet" offered — I can view it as nothing else — by the Noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Richmond). Undoubtedly, it is quite competent to any person who thinks himself injured to appeal to a court of law; but the expense, inconvenience, delay, and difficulty, considering the intimidation which prevents witnesses coming forward, are such as might well deter any one from resorting to that mode of gaining redress.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON. — I did not call upon the Noble Earl to assume the character of public prosecutor; but, if he think proper to accuse people, he should take care to do it in such a shape as to enable them to defend and justify themselves if they are not guilty. That would be but just on the part of the Noble Earl; it is not just to come down to this House, night after night, and accuse gentlemen, without taking those steps which would enable them to justify themselves. When the Noble Earl makes statements such as the House has this night heard, I think that those statements ought to be accompanied by a motion respecting some one particular case. The House ought to have the papers, on both sides, before them — the defence as well as the charge. Thus, and thus alone, can your Lordships be enabled to see who are right and who are wrong. That which I now desire to say upon the subject is, — that the Noble Earl gives a most exaggerated view of one side of the question; he gives the case strongly against individuals who are not present to defend themselves. He makes charges in the most exaggerated terms, and will not listen to any defence. He refuses to the parties accused those documents which are necessary for enabling them to make an effective defence.

EARL STANHOPE. — I deny that I have done anything of the sort.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON. — It is true, though; and I heard the Noble Earl say, the other night, that he would not send the papers to the commissioners, because he would not give an opportunity to "the dictators," as he called them, of knowing with what they were charged.

EARL STANHOPE. — The papers to which the Noble Duke refers are already before the House, and the defence of the commissioners has already been sufficiently made by the Noble Viscount. I have not been guilty of any refusal of documentary evidence to the commissioners. I declared, and I acted upon that declaration, that all due publicity should be given to the papers in question; but at the same time I added, that I should not hold any direct communication with the commissioners. The papers have been published.

The DUKE of RICHMOND. — It is evident that the Noble Earl cannot have a good case, or he would never have spoken of the people of Sussex and Hampshire having been subjected to the influence of intimidation; it is no such easy matter to intimidate the people of those counties. The Noble Earl, himself, can hardly believe that anything like intimidation exists in those quarters. If the evils arising out of the present state of the poor laws were really so great as the Noble Earl represents them to be, he surely would not lose an hour in bringing the subject fully in detail before the House, and proposing a measure to put an end to these horrors. But, so far from being instant and energetic in proposing such a remedy, he contents himself with postponing the whole matter till the next Session of Parliament. The Noble Earl very much mistakes what has taken place between us on the subject of legal costs. I never offered a bet to the Noble Earl. I begged to know whether the Noble Earl would pay the expenses if the prosecution proved unsuccessful?

EARL STANHOPE. — No.

The DUKE of RICHMOND. — Then, if he does not agree to do that, how can other parties be expected to undertake the payment of costs should the Westbourne guardians be defeated? The House must recollect the offer I made; and it certainly, I think, did not come within the proper description of a bet. There is nothing of which I entertain a stronger conviction, than that the Westbourne guardians are, in all respects, perfectly in the right. I move, That the examination be laid before the House, relating to the conduct of the Westbourne guardians towards Thomas Coombs; and I hope that, as the Noble Earl has published one part of the proceedings, he will use his influence to give as wide a circulation to the antidote as has been given to the poison. When the communications are before the House, I shall move that they be referred to a select committee.

EARL STANHOPE. — I confess that it occasions me some surprise to learn that the Noble Duke should have expected me, this night, or even in the present Session, to proceed with the resolutions of which I have given notice for the next Session. Those resolutions, if adopted, would pledge the House to nothing less than a repeal of the existing Poor Law of this country.

Motion agreed to; and petition read, and ordered to lie on the table.

EARL STANHOPE. — I beg to lay before your Lordships a petition from the guardians of the poor of the parish of St. George the Martyr, Southwark; and it is not necessary that I should now recapitulate the contents. It complains, however, amongst other matters, of the misrepresentation to which the petitioners have been subjected by the Poor Law Commissioners; and the grounds of their complaint rest upon information which has been already supplied to the Secretary of State for the Home Department. The parish of St. George had a calculation made, showing their parochial expenses before 1836, and subsequently to that period; from which it appears that, in 1834, 1835, and 1836, the average decrease of expense was 2000*l.* a-year. At present, the Poor Law Commissioners take credit to themselves for a further saving of 1000*l.* a-year; which saving, it is evident from the papers before me, arises in no respect from the operation of the New Poor Law. The case of the parish of St. George, Southwark, is by no means a solitary instance. I hold in my hand a Report from the auditors and committee of the house accounts, made on the second of last month, to the corporation and guardians of the poor of the city and county of the city of Chester, which refers to the topic I have brought under your Lordships' consideration, in the following terms: —

We cannot close this Report without congratulating the leypayers on the resistance which was effectually made to the introduction of the New Poor Law into this city, and on the reduction of the expenditure by a board of guardians, independent of the Poor Law Commissioners, and of those restrictions and privations which are enforced under their rules, orders, and regulations, — a reduction equal to that which, in other parts of the kingdom, they and their friends proclaim as the result of the Poor Law Amendment Act, which it is evident is not necessarily to be attributed to that law.

In the first year after the introduction of the Poor Law, the rate in that parish (St. George) was 7*d.* in the pound; in 1837 it became 14*d.* in the pound, without any alteration in the workhouse. In 1838, the tradesmen's bills remaining due amounted to 2000*l.* When the Poor Law came into operation, the parish had 1500*l.* in the hands of their treasurer, besides other funds to an equal amount, — making in the whole 3000*l.* The condition of their affairs, then, has been misrepresented by the commissioners in a manner the most unjust and injurious; and I will add, that I do not understand how any one can help perceiving that they have been made the subject of wilful falsehood. As regards the guardians of the parish of St. George, I beg to bear my testimony to the careful and exemplary manner in which they have discharged their duties. No guardians could, under the circumstances, have done more than they have done to protect the rights of the ratepayers and the interests of the poor; and I must say, that the conduct which they have pursued, and the information which they have supplied, have gone a great way towards dispelling the delusions which the commissioners have been endeavouring to create, but in vain to create; for they have fully shown that the decrease in the rates is not to be attributed to the operation of the New Poor Law, but to causes perfectly distinct,—one of which evidently is the demand for labour occasioned by the progress of railways and other public works.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — There has been an error in the computation made relative to the years 1833, 1834, and 1835, to which the Noble Earl has just referred, and which produces an apparent difference of 7 per cent., — being the difference between 40 and 47. That error was certainly not committed by the commissioners; it was committed by the clerk of the guardians, and the guardians naturally adopted it from him. It is no great matter of surprise that such an error should have crept into a calculation involving so many particulars of such great amount; and it is, after all, a matter of no very great moment. The parish of St. George is not united with any other parish; its accounts will, probably, therefore, be not kept with as much accuracy as if two parishes were interested in the result; but even supposing the error to have been greater than it really is, it still furnishes no grounds for the general conclusions sought to be drawn from it. In conclusion, I beg to move, That there be laid before the House a copy of Report by the Right Honourable T. Frankland Lewis to Lord John Russell, dated the 27th of November, 1838, on the subject of some letters purporting to be signed by Mr. Day, a member of the board of guardians of the parish of St. George the Martyr, Southwark, printed in a public journal, wherein the Poor Law Commissioners are charged with a fraudulent representation of the average expenditure of the parish for the three years previous to the 25th of March, 1835.

EARL STANHOPE. — The petitioners are prepared to prove that they, and not the commissioners, are in the right. I now beg to move, That there be laid before your Lordships, copies of three letters addressed to Lord John Russell by Mr. John Day, a member of the board of guardians of the parish of St. George the Martyr, Southwark; one dated the 3d of December, 1838, another dated the 15th of December, 1838, and a third dated ——

EDUCATION (IRELAND).

Mr. D. BROWNE. — I rise, to present a petition from the Roman Catholic archbishop and clergy of the diocese of Tuam, of which, as it is of very great length, I shall content myself with reading the following passages: —

That your petitioners beg to approach your Honourable House with the unfeigned assurance of their devotion to the throne and person of our most gracious Sovereign. That while "they give unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's," they cannot be unmindful of the other precept that issued from the same divine source, of giving to God the things that are God's. That the religious education of their respective flocks is a duty exclusively belonging to the spiritual authority of the pastors of the church, and which they cannot resign into any other hands without a renunciation of those obligations which they owe to its Divine Founder. The petitioners beg to impress upon your Honourable House that religion, to be effective, must be definite in its creed; and that any plan that would attempt to combine the discordant tenets of different sects of Christianity in a vague belief would be utterly subversive of its foundation, and equally at variance with that solicitude which Protestants feel for the Articles of the established church, as well as with the zeal with which Catholics have clung to their faith under the most adverse fortunes. The petitioners further beg to observe that, in the diocese of Tuam alone, there is a Catholic population of four hundred and seventy thousand persons, and there is not more than one to fifty of all other religious creeds: that the petitioners conceive it to be utterly unreasonable that for one in fifty they should submit to a system of education fashioned for a mixed population of all Christian sects, and regulated by a manifest preponderance of Protestant principles and influence. The petitioners, therefore, seeing no hope of accommodation with a body whose pretensions are so arbitrary that they cannot be submitted to without the most imminent peril to the Catholic faith,—since it, undisguisedly, supersedes the authority by which that faith is protected, take this solemn opportunity of assuring your Honourable House that, henceforward, they hold no connection whatever, pecuniary or otherwise, with that board; and they will use all the spiritual influence of their sacred office to withdraw the children of their respective parishes from so dangerous a connection.

On the question, — "That this petition be brought up," —

Mr. LAW said: — By the Roman Catholic Relief Act, any Roman Catholic clergyman who assumes the title of a dignitary of the Protestant church subjects himself to a penalty. I therefore beg to ask the Honourable Member who presented the petition, whether I am correct in supposing that it purports to be the petition of a person calling himself the Archbishop of Tuam? If such be the case, I shall feel it my duty to move that the petition be rejected.

Mr. D. BROWNE. — The petition is signed "John M'Hale." It is described, in the heading, as the petition of the Archbishop and Clergy of the diocese of Tuam, but it is not so signed. The signature "John M'Hale" has no such title or character attached to it.

Mr. LAW. — The designation, then, given to the individual in question, is a false designation. I therefore move that the petition be rejected.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — The statement of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, so far as it relates to that individual, is false.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!" "Order!"]

SIR R. INGLIS. — I rise to order. I hope, Sir, that you will protect this House against the Honourable and Learned Member for Dublin. Whatever the Honourable and Learned Member may say or do out of doors, where no such protection to Members can be obtained, I hope that here, at least, he will be taught to observe those rules and regulations which were made by the House for conducting its debates, and insuring protection to every Gentleman in the fair expression of his opinions. I trust, therefore, Sir, that you will not only pronounce the interruption of the Honourable and Learned Member to have been most disorderly, but also call upon him to retract and apologise for it.

The SPEAKER. — Undoubtedly, the conduct of the Honourable and Learned Member, in applying the term "false" to a statement made by another Honourable Member is most disorderly; and he is bound, out of respect to that Honourable Gentleman and to the House, at once to retract and apologise for it.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — After the expression of that, your opinion, Sir, I do not hesitate to retract and apologise for the term which fell from me, in the fullest sense that your words can require.

Petition brought up, and read.

The SPEAKER. — The question is, "That the petition do lie on the table."

SIR R. INGLIS. — On examining the petition, Sir, I find that it is signed "John M'Hale," with a cross affixed, — but there appears to be an erasure after that signature. I beg to ask the Honourable Member for Mayo whether he is cognizant of any erasure?

Mr. D. BROWNE. — I will explain the cause of that erasure. The petition was forwarded to me by the Archbishop of Tuam, — the only Archbishop of Tuam now existing, — and attached to that name were the words "Archbishop of Tuam." In a letter, which I received along with the petition, Dr. M'Hale stated, that if the presentation of the petition with that term attached to his name should be considered irregular, I might erase it if I pleased. Deeming that addition to the name to be irregular, — wishing to avoid any unnecessary discussion, — and not supposing that any objection would be stated against the receiving of the petition in its present form, — I erased the words "Archbishop of Tuam." It may be irregular for Dr. M'Hale to describe himself as Archbishop of Tuam; but there is no law to prevent me from describing him so, if I should so think fit. I never could have supposed that the House would evince such an intolerant disposition as to reject the petition, simply because it proceeds from certain Roman Catholic clergymen.

Mr. LAW. — I trust that the House will not allow this petition to be received. The Honourable Member opposite has stated that, originally, there was an addition to the name of John M'Hale, of the style and title of "Archbishop of Tuam;" but that he has received authority from Dr. M'Hale to erase that style and title; and that, in order to avoid any discussion on the right of assuming such signature, he has accordingly done so. But this petition is in its designation and heading the petition of the Archbishop of Tuam, although no such archbishop by law exists. It is clear that Dr. M'Hale assumes, and that there is given to him by others, a title, which by law does not belong to him, — although he may not be liable to a penalty, the Protestant jurisdiction as to the province having ceased to exist. But I nevertheless submit to the House, that it would be highly improper to receive the petition, because it is signed by a person who assumes a title that was recently borne by the Protestant archbishop. It is trifling with the House, after an Act of Parliament has ordered no man to assume that title, for any person to petition it in the name of the Archbishop of Tuam. I regret that any man should be permitted to beard this House by the assumption of that designation, and I hope the House will not permit the petition to be received.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I think, Sir, that, according to all practices of the House, this petition ought to be received. There may be some force in the observation of the Honourable and Learned Member for the University of Cambridge, that the signature to this petition is that of an individual describing himself as Archbishop of Tuam; but this is not the petition of the person so describing himself, only, but the petition of the Archbishop of Tuam and of clergy professing the Roman Catholic religion. So far, then, it ought to be received. What is more common than for the House to receive petitions signed by one individual on the part of a whole meeting? And yet, by the construction now put on the practice of this House by the Honourable and Learned Member opposite, because the person had signed it in the same manner as a chairman of a meeting would have done, this petition ought not to be received. We have received such petitions before; and therefore, I say, we ought not to reject this one. The person who has signed it may have assumed a title which is not legally recognised; but, as the petition of certain Roman Catholic clergy, it ought to be received without scrutinising its title.

Mr. WYNN. — I regret extremely that a petition so headed as this should have been presented. Such a discussion is at all times unpleasant, and one which I always wish to avoid; but I must say that when a party in this petition is described by a title to which he has no right, and the attention of the House is called to that circumstance, we should neglect our duty if we received it. If it had been simply described as the petition of John M'Hale, archbishop, and others of the Roman Catholic clergy, I think there could be no objection to it; for by the Protestant establishment have been always recognised the ordination and clerical rank of the archbishops, bishops, and clergy of the Roman Catholic religion. But it is a different thing to admit the claim of a title to episcopal jurisdiction within a province in Ireland. In the Act for removing the disabilities of Roman Catholics is the following clause: —

> Be it therefore enacted, that if any person, after the commencement of this Act, other than the person thereunto authorised by law, shall assume or use the name, style, or title of archbishop of any province, bishop of any bishoprick, or dean of any deanery, in England or Ireland, he shall, for every such offence, forfeit and pay the sum of 100*l*.

There is no doubt that in this case here is an assumption of the title of Archbishop of a province in Ireland. Whether that has been done by the act of the person himself, or not, is another thing; but I must say that the Honourable Member judged perfectly right in erasing the title, if he thought he had sufficient authority to do so, in order to avoid any objection of the House on that account; and I regret that that authority did not extend further, and permit him to take from the head of the petition the designation of the Archbishop of Tuam.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — It seems to me that the Honourable and Learned Member opposite is utterly mistaken when he says there is no law permitting a Roman Catholic archbishop of Ireland to assume this title. It may possibly be alleged, that, by the statute law, this gentleman, Dr. M'Hale, is not Archbishop of Tuam; but by the common law he is the only person who can claim that title. Now, by the statute law, up to the time of the Emancipation Bill, he was not prevented from making use of it. On the contrary, the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite has distinctly admitted that the episcopal rank of the Roman Catholic clergy is recognised by the statute and common law. There is no such province as Tuam in the established church, at present; it has lately ceased to exist; and therefore the use of the name or appellation of Archbishop of Tuam does not affect that church. I am sorry that this question should have been raised; but it has been raised, not by the individual himself, but by others, and that fact forms, therefore, no reason why the petition should be rejected. The Learned Recorder for London has admitted, distinctly, that a person is not liable to a penalty for assuming the title of Archbishop of Tuam, because there is no subsisting episcopal province of that name in the established church. This admission is, in point of fact, an admission that the person alluded to was entitled to make the assumption he has made. There is no law against his doing so, and there is, therefore, no reason for rejecting the petition.

SIR R. INGLIS. — If there be anything which I more deprecate than another, it is that spurious candour with which a person sometimes sacrifices principle for the sake of popularity; but I must say that I am not prepared to vote against the reception of this petition. The person who has signed the petition has authorised the erasure of the title "Archbishop of Tuam" from his signature, and he therefore practically submits to the House, that the claim he was once disposed to urge is not tenable, and that he consequently withdraws it. The petition not being signed by Dr. M'Hale, as Archbishop of Tuam, I take as an admission, on the part of that gentleman, that he formally and publicly renounces it. I believe — without entering into the law of the case, or reviving the discussion that took place in the House on this subject ten days ago — that the law is not violated by the petition as it now stands. Suppose the petition were from the Pope, who had signed it as Pope, on the part of a number of individuals, — as far as the forms of the House are concerned, there would be no legal or technical evidence on which we could reject it. This, then, is precisely the case, here. The petition is signed by Dr. M'Hale, on the part of the "Archbishop of Tuam" and certain Roman Catholic clergy; but non constat that any individual claims that title; and from what has occurred, I think the House may assume that that title is withdrawn.

Mr. D. BROWNE. — The Honourable Baronet who has just sat down has completely misunderstood me. It was not the intention of Dr. M'Hale to relinquish the title of Archbishop of Tuam, by permitting me to erase that designation from the petition, if I should think it would be contrary to the interest of the petition, on presenting it to the House, to allow it to remain. On the contrary, I wish it to be distinctly understood by the House, that I know it to be the intention of Dr. M'Hale not to relinquish that title, which he feels he has a right to assume as the archbishop of the only archiepiscopal see of Tuam.

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — I agree with the Honourable Member for the University of Oxford, in disclaiming all spurious candour by sacrificing principle to popularity; but I cannot have it assumed, under any kind of management, or the shutting of my eyes against a plain fact, that, if a petition be presented from a person calling himself Archbishop of Tuam, who signs himself as such, but subsequently authorises some one to take away that signature, and if, thereupon, a difficulty arises as to the reception of that petition, that that difficulty is removed by the fact of the erasure; — I would say that no one can be satisfied that it is not still the petition of the Archbishop of Tuam. It is the petition of the Archbishop of Tuam and the clergy of the Roman Catholic church. Dr. M'Hale signs it as Archbishop of Tuam; and even if an erasure of that title afterwards takes place, the clergy of his church having signed under his name as Archbishop of Tuam, there is no difference in the petition itself. It has been said by an Honourable Member, that petitions are sometimes received by the House, signed by one individual on the part of many; but that is on account of the numbers which would otherwise have to subscribe; whilst in the present petition a positive object, on the part of a few, only, is involved. If this petition be received, it will appear on the records of the House, that at this time was received a petition from the "Archbishop of Tuam" and other clergy of the Roman Catholic church. It is immaterial whether Dr. M'Hale has since caused the removal of the title, or not, as the use of it, at first, proves his assumption of the title. I shall most cordially vote for the rejection of this petition, — considering such a course essentially necessary to the dignity of the House, and to the interests of the Protestant church.

DOCTOR LUSHINGTON. — I would ask the House to consider what will most probably be the feelings excited in the minds of the people of Ireland by the course that has been adopted on this occasion, when it is a matter of the utmost importance that the House should retain the confidence, and, if possible, the esteem and affection, of 7,000,000 of our fellow subjects, in that country, although they may be of a different religious persuasion from the established church? When this debate shall go forth to the public, and they shall see that this important petition — bearing the signatures of one of the prelates of the Roman Catholic church and numerous others of the Roman Catholic clergy — was rejected on such grounds as have been stated, my firm conviction is, that the people of Ireland will think we are most anxious and astute to avail ourselves of the technical rules and usages of the House for shutting our doors to petitions, and avoiding all examination into the grievances of which they complain. Therefore, the step which the House may take on the present occasion is of infinite importance to the welfare of Ireland. The rejection of the petition on account of the Protestant feeling mentioned by the Honourable Member for Penryn will prove an exasperation, and almost an insult, to the Roman Catholics of Ireland. Now that the Union has taken place, and the Emancipation Bill is passed, the House ought to consider petitions, come from what quarter they may, — whether from Roman Catholics, Churchmen, or Dissenters, — all in the same light, and on a footing of equality. Let the House consider the nature of the objection itself. I will suppose for a moment that it is to a misdescription of one individual in the petition. It may be possible, perhaps, to point out one instance — but I defy any one to show me, generally, many — of petitions signed by persons giving themselves certain descriptions (unless in the case of corporations), where the House has examined strictly into the legal rights of the parties to the titles or characters which they have so assumed. It is said that a character is assumed by a person signing this petition, which is not allowed by law. That is the charge. The proceeding is not asserted to be a violation of the Act of Parliament. If Dr. M'Hale had assumed a title belonging to any existing Protestant body, and if the House had had evidence of that fact, then might we have grounds for rejecting the petition. But there is no one who claims to be the Protestant "Archbishop of Tuam." The case is, therefore, limited to this extent; and, under these circumstances, there is no provision in law to prevent a Roman Catholic bishop from assuming the title of Archbishop of Tuam. There is no person who can say that there is an Archbishop of Tuam in law. Is it worth while, then, — nay, is it wise, is it prudent, or even decent, — upon an objection of this kind, to reject a petition containing a statement of the feelings and opinions of a large portion of the clergy and people of Ireland?

SIR G. CLERK. — I am rather surprised at the warmth evinced by the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman on a question of mere form in our proceedings. I agree with that Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman, that to object to the reception of a petition coming from the Roman Catholic clergy of Ireland, upon a subject on which they appear to take a deep interest, — upon a mere point of form, is a step which ought not to be taken. I think it is very easy for the Honourable Member for Mayo to escape from the difficulty. That Honourable Member has stated that he was authorised by Dr. M'Hale to strike off the adjunct of "Archbishop of Tuam" to his signature in the petition; why not also strike out the same designation at the head of the petition? and then the petition would appear to be from the Roman Catholic clergy in certain parts of Ireland. The Noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department, on a former occasion, stated that he had refused to present an Address to his late Majesty, because this very same reverend gentleman was described in it as Archbishop of Tuam. This being so, I hope the Honourable Member for Mayo will not object to withdraw the petition for the purpose of making the alteration suggested.

Mr. D. BROWNE. — Although I have been authorised by Dr. M'Hale to strike off the adjunct to his signature, yet I have no authority to make any other not merely the petition of Dr. M'Hale, but alteration in the petition, inasmuch as it is of a large portion of the Catholic clergy.

Mr. GOULBURN. — By striking out the word "Tuam," at the head of the petition, the difficulty may be obviated.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I confess that I am unable to give any very competent opinion upon this subject, because a great part of the discussion had already taken place before I entered the House. I wish, however, that the House should be relieved from the difficulty of deciding upon the question. There is an obvious objection to the Honourable Member for Mayo's making any alteration in the petition: on the other hand, the statement that it is the petition (among others) of the Archbishop of Tuam places the House in a situation of very great difficulty; because, if we rejected the petition on that ground, it might be conceived to be a captious objection; and yet, at the same time, it is obvious that to receive such a petition would be contrary to the spirit of the Act of Parliament, — the description being evidently against the spirit of the Act, although it may not be against the letter. As the Honourable Gentleman has stated that he has no authority to withdraw the petition, or to alter the wording of it, I shall certainly feel compelled, if the question be pressed, to vote against its being received.

Mr. M. J. O'CONNELL. — It may be true, as the Noble Lord has said, that to receive this petition would be contrary to the spirit of the Act of Parliament; but that Act is, in its nature, a penal one against the people of Ireland, and ought not to be extended in its operation one jot beyond what is in strictness the letter of the Act. It is admitted that there is no violation of the letter of the law; it will, therefore, produce a strange effect in Ireland, where it shall be said that the House of Commons was inclined to do what no court of law ever did, — namely, extend a penal Act beyond the letter.

The House divided on the question of bringing up the petition: — Ayes 82; Noes 165; — Majority 83.

CHURCH LEASES.

Mr. LAMBTON. — Sir, I wish to ask the Noble Lord whether it is his intention, this Session, to introduce any measure founded on the recommendation of the Committee on Church Leases? The holders of that property cannot, at present, borrow money on that security, owing to the unsettled state of the question; and it is of importance that some measure respecting it should be enacted as speedily as possible.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Sir, I am fully aware of the importance of the subject to which the Honourable Member has referred; but from the many difficulties attendant on it, I beg to say it is not my intention to propose any Bill on the subject during the present Session; but early next Session I hope to be able to submit to the House some measure that will give satisfaction to the country.

TITHE COMPOSITION ACT.

Mr. HODGES. — Sir, I wish to ask the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department, whether it is the intention of Government to introduce a Bill to amend and explain the Tithe Composition Act this Session?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — It is our intention to introduce a Bill for that purpose.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS,

That they have agreed to — Leeds and Harewood Road Bill, without amendment.

That they have passed a Bill, intituled, "An Act for giving Effect to certain Powers as to Parts of the settled Estates of the Most Noble Richard Plantagenet, Duke of Buckingham and Chandos."

Also, a Bill, intituled, "An Act to dissolve the Marriage of Robert Allison with Mary Ann his now Wife, and to enable him to marry again; and for other Purposes therein mentioned."

BANK OF IRELAND.

SIR W. SOMERVILLE. — Sir, I wish to know whether it is the intention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to introduce any measure, during the present Session, for the regulation of the system of banking in Ireland?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — It is my intention to bring in a Bill on the subject adverted to by the Honourable Member.

Mr. O'CONNELL. — I wish to know whether the object of that Bill will be to continue the present system of banking till 1842?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — It is my intention to propose some alterations; but it is impossible, at this moment, to go into details.

JAMAICA BILL.

Mr. GOULBURN. — Sir, I wish to be informed whether the Noble Lord intends to bring on the Jamaica Bill to-morrow?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — No; I shall postpone the Jamaica Bill till Monday, and take the vote for national education to-morrow (Friday).

SIR R. PEEL. — Sir, it may be convenient to all parties to state that the sense of the House will be taken on the third reading of the Jamaica Bill, with respect to that particular clause which provides for permanent legislation.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Does the Right Honourable Gentleman mean to take the sense of the House on the omission of the whole of the same clause on which the sense of the House was taken before?

SIR R. PEEL. — Yes.

Mr. BERNAL then brought up the Report on the Jamaica Bill, which was ordered to be ingrossed, and to be taken into consideration to-morrow.

WATERFORD FEVER HOSPITAL BILL.

Read a third time, and passed.

DUKE OF BUCKINGHAM'S ESTATE BILL.

Read a first time; to be read a second time.

JAMAICA BILL.

CANADA.

The Order of the Day for the resumption of the adjourned debate upon Canada, and the first resolution, — "That it is the opinion of this House, that it is expedient to form a legislative union of the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, on the principles of a free and representative government, in such a manner as may most conduce to the prosperity and contentment of the people of the united provinces," — having been read, —

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said: — Sir, I have to move for leave to withdraw the resolution which has been read, intending immediately to ask for leave to bring in a Bill.

LORD STANLEY. — Sir, my objection, the other day, was to the mode of the proceeding which had been adopted by her Majesty's Government. My desire is, that no opinion should be given by the House as to the expediency or the practicability of uniting the two provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, till we see the details of the Bill to effect that object; and as the Noble Lord has proposed to withdraw the resolutions which, as I thought, unnecessarily and improperly pledged the House to the abstract principle, my purpose has been altogether answered. I can have no objection to the course now proposed, or to the Noble Lord's proceeding by Bill; on the contrary, I am most anxious to see the mode in which it is intended to deal with this question, — for it is most desirable, not only for this country but for all persons in Upper and Lower Canada, that the views of her Majesty's Government should be known at as early a period, and as distinctly, as possible; and my only regret is, that the Noble Lord should think that it is not possible to carry out the intentions of Government during the present Session. The interests involved are so important, that it is desirable there should be no party discussion; and, considering what has already passed, and the present condition of the colonies, I hold that it would be better that there should not be any partial debate, into which topics of an irritating nature might be introduced, upon the present occasion. I will, therefore, content myself with stating the satisfaction I feel at the course which has been pursued by the Noble Lord, and I will abstain altogether from expressing any opinion upon the measure till I am in possession of the details.

Leave was then given to withdraw the resolution.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Sir, I will now proceed to move for leave to bring in the two Bills, which I stated I would submit when I had withdrawn the resolution; and, with the Noble Lord, I feel that it would be unnecessary now to have any discussion, or to ask for the opinion of the House. After what I said the other day, in proposing that resolution, as to the general views of her Majesty's Government, it is not necessary for me, nor would it be advantageous that I should enter into any details on the subject of Canada. I will state, generally, that it is our opinion that, upon the whole, it is most advantageous that the two provinces of Upper and Lower Canada should be united; but that it would expose such union to great risk, and to a great probability of failure, if we did not previously take all possible means to provide for legislation in Lower Canada, so that no topics of irritation should exist at the first meeting of the Assembly of the united provinces. With this view, I propose that, till the period of the union, efficient and certain powers should be intrusted to the Government of this country, and to the Governor in Canada, for effecting this desirable change in the legislation of that colony. It has been stated that, practically, there is now an important obstacle to that legislation which is necessary to avert immediate danger. I therefore propose to introduce a Bill for the temporary continuance of the Act of last Session for the suspension of the constitution, so that the colony may be brought to a desirable state before the Bill for the union shall come into operation. I shall state the particulars of this Bill before I proceed to the Bill for the union. By the new Bill I intend to amend the Act of last Session in several particulars. I propose, in the first place, to alter that clause of the Act on which so much difference of opinion was expressed, last Session, in this House, — a difference of opinion which has extended to the judicial bench in Canada. It has been stated, upon high authority, — not, indeed, by any person holding any official situation, but in the reported speeches of persons of eminent legal authority, — that the Bill of last Session did not authorise the Governor to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act, or to take other immediate measures for the suppression of insurrection. By one provision of the Bill, I now propose to alter the clause generally known as Sir William Follett's clause, and to limit its operation to measures affecting the clergy, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, or affecting the tenures of land. It was stated by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman that this was the principal object he had in view, and that, whatever the legal effect of the clause might be, he did not intend it to prevent necessary measures of legislation.

Another inconvenience which was felt was the want of a power to impose taxes for strictly local purposes, such as the watching, and the local roads. I propose, therefore, to alter the clause originally introduced by ourselves, and to give power to impose rates and taxes: these are not to be paid into the public treasury, but to be applicable only for local purposes, — for the watching, and the roads. This provision will greatly encourage immigration, by enabling Government to give employment to the new settlers. I likewise propose that the powers given under that Act to the Governor and council should be continued for eighteen months beyond the period at which they would, now, by law, expire. That Act will expire in November, 1840; and I propose that, with the alteration to which I have alluded, it shall be continued till March, 1842. I do not say that that is the precise period of extension necessary. It may be possible to call together the general Assembly of the united provinces before that time; but it is better to take, in the Bill, a time beyond which it is improbable that it will be necessary to continue the Act. If her Majesty's Government find that it is the general wish and opinion of both provinces that the united Assembly should meet earlier, the special powers given by this Bill may end at that time. With regard to the other Bill, for the union of the two provinces, as a consequence of not proceeding to enact a law in the present Session, it may be necessary to change some of the proposed provisions. The Bill, however, which I would ask leave to introduce, provides for the establishment of a central district at Montreal and its neighbourhood, in which the Government shall be carried on, and where the Assembly shall meet. The other parts of Upper Canada and of Lower Canada are each to be divided into two districts. It is proposed that these districts should be formed for the purpose of becoming municipal districts for the imposition of taxes and rates for all local purposes. I need not, now, enter into the reasons which, in my opinion, justify such a proposition. It was intended to have local commissioners belonging to the former Legislative Assemblies of Lower Canada and of Upper Canada, to ascertain and fix the districts to return members to the united Assembly; but in consequence of the recent change of intention, it is thought better that the division should be effected by direct enactment, by the Imperial Parliament's receiving all the local information that can be obtained as to the boundaries and districts. Those boundaries and districts are not defined by the Bill, but are referred to as to be defined in the schedule. I have said that it is proposed to have a central district, and that there are to be four other districts.

Each of these districts is to be divided into nine other divisions; so that there will be in the whole, supposing each division to return two members, ninety members for the different divisions or electoral districts. In addition to these, I propose that the four largest towns should each return two members,—making ninety-eight members in the whole. I believe that I stated, on a former occasion, my opinion as to the Legislative Council, and other parts of the Bill relating to the local Legislature. I will not, therefore, now go into them. It is better that the House should see the Bill itself and judge of its provisions, rather than that I should enter into any further explanation at present; and I will therefore content myself with moving "for leave to bring in a Bill for re-uniting the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, and for the Government of the united province."

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — Sir, I entirely concur with my Noble Friend, in thinking that, in a matter of so much importance, it is better to postpone all discussion upon the Bill, till we have an opportunity of examining the provisions. I wish, however, to ask the Noble Lord one or two questions. The Noble Lord says that he, on a former occasion, stated his views with respect to the Legislative Council; and, as I understand the Noble Lord, his opinion is, that that council ought to remain constituted upon the same principle as at present. Upon a matter of so much importance, without meaning to provoke any discussion, I would ask the Noble Lord to explain the principle on which the council will be constituted? The other question which I wish to ask is, whether the elective franchise for the five districts for constituting municipal bodies, having power to impose local rates and taxes, is to be identical with the elective franchise in the counties?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — With regard to the first question, what I stated upon a former occasion was, that I did not propose to depart from the principle, that the Legislative Council should be named or proposed by the Crown; but that care should be taken, pursuant to the resolution of this House, to select men of some mark, on whom the confidence of the Crown had been bestowed, or who were entitled to confidence in consequence of the election of the people. I would provide, therefore, that the council should be composed of persons who have either held some office of consequence or importance, or of well known authority, —or of members of the Assembly. Certain qualifications, therefore, are to be insisted on; and the selection is not to be left to the caprice of the Governor, who cannot for the future appoint persons unknown in, or not belonging to, the province. The members of this council, too, are not to be appointed for life, but are to hold office for eight years only. With regard to the franchise, the right of election is to be the same for the municipal and the general elections.

SIR R. PEEL. — At the end of the eight years, is it to be in the power of the Crown to re-appoint the parties?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — The Crown is to have power to re-appoint.

Mr. C. BULLER. — Sir, it is not my wish, against the sense of the House, to continue the present debate; but it is a question, whether the mode proposed by the Noble Lord for the union of the two provinces will be better than their present condition?

Bill ordered to be brought in by LORD JOHN RUSSELL and Mr. LABOUCHERE.

LORD J. RUSSELL next moved for leave to bring in a Bill, to continue and amend the Act 1 Vic. c. 9., for making temporary provision for the government of Lower Canada.

Mr. C. BULLER. — Sir, I would not allow to pass through a single stage, without giving to it my strenuous opposition, a Bill to continue the present system of provisional government, were it not that the Bill not merely continues the present system, but also gives to the special council a power which they do not at present possess. My experience of affairs in Canada convinces me, that leaving the special council with its present limited power would be leaving the colony without any legislative power at all. A Bill, therefore, having for its object to give to the council further powers, ought to pass in some form or other; though I would oppose, in the most strenuous manner, any attempt to continue, unaltered, the present provisional and arbitrary power subsisting in Lower Canada.

SIR CHARLES GREY. — Sir, in my opinion, the House will see that the best thing we can do, at present, is to continue the powers vested in the Governor and council. The opinion expressed in a former debate, — that we are just where we were, — that we have gained no step of importance, — and that we have effected no extrication out of the difficulties in which the province was involved, — I believe to be erroneous. If we view our present position rightly, — if we look at the difficulties in which the province has been involved, whether produced by the one party or the other, — we shall see that we are, now, in a situation in which we are more capable of dealing with the difficulties in which the province is at present involved than we have been for a long time past. Two great steps have been taken towards a settlement; — we have suspended the Assembly, which was necessary to procure a settlement; and we have procured a revenue, which is necessary for carrying on the Government. It should also be recollected, that Lower Canada is free from debt, while the upper province is deeply involved. The revenue of Lower Canada is always more than sufficient for all the purposes of its Government.

Bill ordered to be brought in by LORD JOHN RUSSELL and Mr. LABOUCHERE.

METROPOLIS POLICE BILL.

On the motion of LORD JOHN RUSSELL, the House resolved itself into committee on the Metropolis Police Bill, and clauses 22. to 27. were agreed to.

Clauses 28, 29, and 30. were agreed to.

On clause 31. (As to pay and deductions therefrom, of officers, &c.), being proposed, —

CAPTAIN BOLDERO said: — Sir, I object to the provisions of this clause, which declare that the pay of the officers shall be stopped in case of illness, — and that certain fines shall be imposed, and a reduction take place, to the amount of 2½ per cent. on the pay, the proceeds of which are to be applied to a superannuation fund. I think it would be hard, if, after fifteen years' service, a man could not get superannuation except on these terms. Besides, you will not require anything like the sum here proposed to be raised. You are about to raise 9500*l.* a-year, which, in fifteen years, will amount to nearly 150,000*l.*; and surely, in that space of time, the ordinary casualties will leave very few cases of superannuation to be provided for. By your plan, the policeman will gain no advantage which he could not get in an assurance company. I will not move an amendment in the clause, trusting that before the third reading of the Bill it will be altered by its proposers.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — Sir, I feel it right to tell the Honourable and Gallant Member that the clause has been very fully considered; and I conceive it likely to be most beneficial to the police, in procuring for them a fund which they did not before possess, and to which they may go when prevented, by weakness, from continuing in the service of the public. Besides, the reduction proposed of each income is very trifling, as the pay is considerable — 60*l.* a-year. Therefore the superannuation fund does not come to more than 2 per cent. In addition to this, the men will have a source of compensation they do not now enjoy, — namely, the produce of the old clothes, which now goes to benefit the ratepayers.

SIR R. PEEL. — I was not aware that the constables had so much; and I think it would be exceedingly unwise to reduce the salaries of the police officers lower than they now stand. It would be for the advantage of the ratepayers that respectable men should be employed; and the services of such men cannot be secured, except by affording a sufficient remuneration.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — The salary is, I find, about 50*l.* a-year.

Mr. T. S. DUNCOMBE. — Sir, I perceive a provision in the clause, by which the fines imposed on offenders for assaulting the police are to be applied to the superannuation fund. Although there are many very respectable men in the force, yet there might be some among them of bad character, and I think that an inducement to false swearing would be held out.

Mr. GOULBURN. — By applying it to the superannuation, we relieve the ratepayers; and, besides, I hardly think a man would take a false oath, in hopes of partially benefitting by it at the end of fifteen years.

Mr. DARBY. — I think, if the Honourable Member looks to the next clause, he will find the matter set right.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 32. "Time entitling to superannuation."

Mr. GOULBURN. — There are many men in the police who have served in the army. It would be impossible that such men could serve fifteen years in the police. I trust there will be some relaxation of the rule in such cases.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — I think the Right Honourable Gentleman's objection will be met by the good conduct warrants now issuing from the War Office. These warrants entitle the men to deferred pensions, which they can claim at the period of their service in the police.

CAPTAIN BOLDERO. — I think that some provision should be made for those men who are compelled to quit the force before they have served the full time, in respect of which they would be entitled to receive assistance from the superannuation fund.

SIR R. PEEL. — I am also of opinion that fifteen years' service is exceedingly long to be required from a man before he shall be entitled to assistance; but the extent of the payment must, of necessity, be guided by the funds procured.

Mr. LAW. — In my opinion, ten years' service would be sufficient.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — There is no class of men worse paid than the metropolitan police force; and the clauses in this measure, relating to the pay and regulation of the men, seem calculated only to oppress them. In fact, this is a paltry, mean, dirty Government Bill.

CAPTAIN BOLDERO. — I see it is put down in this clause, "that if any constable shall be disabled, by any wound or injury received in the actual execution of the duty of his office, it shall be lawful to grant him any allowance not more than the whole of his pay." I should like to know whether this is to be construed to extend to the general health of a man being injured by the performance of his duty, — for example, if his health should become bad from perpetual exposure to the weather?

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I apprehend not. The meaning is, that if a policeman shall receive a wound or any injury in the actual execution of his duty, he shall receive the full allowance.

The clause was then agreed to.

Clause 33. "Repeal of 2 Geo. III. c. 28."

Clause 34. "Boats to be registered at Watermen's Hall."

Clause 35. "Persons receiving ship stores from seamen, &c."

Clause 36. "Cutting ropes, cables," &c.

Clause 37. "Wilfully letting articles fall into the Thames, &c."

Clause 38. "Framing false bills of parcels."

Clause 39. "Possessing instruments for unlawfully procuring and carrying away wine, &c."

Clause 40. "Piercing casks, opening packages, &c."

Clause 41. "Breaking packages, with intent to spill contents."

Clause 42. "Superintendents and inspectors may board vessels."

The above clauses were severally agreed to, without discussion.

Clause 43. "Constables having just cause to suspect felony, may enter on board vessels, and take up suspected persons."

On this clause being put,—

Mr. LAW said. — I think the power given by this clause is much too great to be lodged in the police force, generally. We cannot reasonably expect from every constable the due caution and discretion requisite for exercising such a power. I would therefore suggest, that constables who are to perform this duty should be taken from a body of picked men, in whom confidence can be placed. It will not do to give, among the whole force indiscriminately, the power of boarding vessels at night, where there are valuable cargoes.

Mr. KEMBLE. — I certainly think, that to give to the common police constables such an arbitrary power, is going much too far; and, unless the clause be modified, I shall move that it be expunged.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — The Right Honourable and Learned Recorder suggests that the constables to perform this duty should be selected from a particular body of men. Now, suppose we were to confine the duty to the sergeants of the force.

SIR EDWARD KNATCHBULL. — I should think that would do. But here are words which, I confess, I do not understand. You say, when a constable has reason to suppose that a felony has been or "is about to be committed," &c. Now, how a constable is to have the intuitive knowledge that a felony is "about to be committed," I do not exactly see.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — Suppose a constable receives certain information which gives him reason to suppose that a felony is "about to be committed" on board a certain ship; is it not better he should possess this power, than that the felony should be permitted to be accomplished?

Mr. HAWES.—All these powers given to the police force are to be regulated by rules laid down by the commissioners: these rules are to be printed; and it is too much to suppose that a common constable is to exercise all these powers upon his own arbitrary will, and without the proper control of his superior officers.

SIR M. WOOD. — As the law at present stands, any man who is found in the street with picklocks, skeleton keys, or under other suspicious circumstances, affording reasonable ground for the supposition that he is about to commit a felony, may be apprehended on suspicion. I do not see, therefore, that the power given by this clause is altogether new.

Mr. LAW. — But apprehending a man under suspicious circumstances, as instanced by the Honourable Alderman, is altogether different from boarding a ship, — which is something very like breaking into a man's house.

Mr. KEMBLE. — I have no wish to diminish the actual power necessary for the effectual protection of property; but I object to the lax and ill-defined expressions by which the power is given.

The clause was then agreed to, with a verbal amendment.

Clause 44. "Unlawful quantities of gunpowder may be seized."

Clause 45. "Penalty for having on board guns loaded with ball, or discharging guns in the night."

Clause 46. "Penalty for burning combustible matters on board vessels."

The above clauses were severally agreed to, without discussion.

Clause 47. "Penalty on keeping fairs open within forbidden hours."

On this clause being put,—

COLONEL SIBTHORP said:—I submit to the committee, that such a proposition as this ought never to have been introduced by a Government calling itself liberal, nor supported by those who arrogate to themselves the title of "the friends of the people." It is enacted by this clause, that "if any house, room, booth, standing, tent, caravan, waggon, or other place, shall, during the continuance of any such fair, be open within the hours of eleven in the evening and six in the morning, for the purpose of business or amusement, in the place where such fair shall be holden, or within 300 yards thereof, it shall be lawful for any constable to take into custody the person having the care or management thereof, and also every person being therein, who shall not quit the same forthwith upon being bidden by such constable so to do." So, if I had a house at Greenwich, within this specified distance of 300 yards, and chose to have a party of friends on a fair day, I and my guests would come under this provision. Then the clause goes on to inflict a penalty of 5*l.* upon the person having the care and management of the house, room, &c., and 40*s.* upon every person who shall be therein, and not immediately go away upon the arbitrary mandate of the police constable. Now, there are very respectable persons who go to Greenwich fair; and I do not see why they should be so arbitrarily restricted as to their hours of amusement, any more than her Majesty's Ministers, when they go down in that quarter to eat white-bait. I repeat, this clause is one which could not have been expected from a liberal Government, and it is most unbecoming and inconsistent on their parts.

Mr. LAW. — You are certainly extending your jurisdiction very much by this Bill.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — Seventeen hours a-day really appear to me to be sufficient for the purpose of holding fairs.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I should propose, instead of the word "eleven," to insert the word "two."

SIR EDWARD KNATCHBULL. — Why should you insert the word "business?" If there is real business to be done, why prevent it?

Digitized by Google

Mr. FOX MAULE. — If we were to leave out that word, we should not effect our object, for the proprietors of the eating booths and gingerbread stalls could keep open under pretence of carrying on their "business."

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I shall move that the clause be omitted altogether.

Question put, "That the clause, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The committee divided: — Ayes, 54; Noes, 8; — Majority, 46.

Clause 48. "Fairs within the metropolitan police district may be inquired into; if declared unlawful booths, &c., to be removed."

Clause 49. "On entering into recognizances, question as to right of title to fair may be tried in the Queen's Bench."

The above clauses were severally agreed to.

Clause 50. "Regulations as to coffee-shops and houses of refreshment."

On this clause being put, —

COLONEL SIBTHORP said: — I really think we might have expected a little more liberality in this clause. I cannot see any good reason for the restriction.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — I certainly consider it a most unnecessary encroachment on the comforts of the people.

Mr. HAWES. — There is the counterpart of this clause in the 3 & 4 Will. IV.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I have seen hotels and places of refreshment open at a much later hour in the neighbourhood of Covent Garden, when I have been returning from attending to my duties in this House. Why should such restrictions be put upon the particular class of houses mentioned in the clause?

Mr. GOULBURN. — I object to the clause also, but on a contrary principle to that of my Honourable and Gallant Friend near me. So far from thinking it amounts to a restriction on the people's liberty, I consider it a very considerable extension.

Mr. FOX MAULE — The rule at present is, to open at four in the morning.

Mr. DARBY. — Will the Honourable Gentleman have any objection to extend the operation of this clause to beer-houses?

Mr. PRYME. — I would ask, why you would limit trade to certain houses, merely because spirits are not sold there?

Mr. DARBY. — Spirits are mentioned in the clause. My only object is with relation to beer-houses.

Mr. KEMBLE. — I think the words "houses licensed for the sale of beer" should be inserted.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — I wish to know why an exception is made in favour of houses where wines and spirits are sold?

SIR M. WOOD. — Those houses are under the control of the magistrates, who have power to close them at eleven o'clock, if they think proper.

The clause was then agreed to, with verbal amendments.

Clause 51. "Freemen of Vintners' Company not to sell wine by retail without licence."

On the motion of Mr. ALDERMAN WOOD, this clause was postponed.

Clause 52. "Public houses to be shut on the morning of Sundays, Christmas Day, and Good Friday, between 8 A. M. and 1 P. M.

On this clause being put, —

CAPTAIN WOOD said: — Does the clause extend to inns on the road-side in the neighbourhood of London?

Mr. HAWES. — Landlords are entitled, under the Licensing Act, to serve bonâ fide travellers.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — The Honourable Member is aware that public houses must be closed during the hours of Divine service. Now, the practice has hitherto been to shut their doors exactly at the time that persons were on their way to church; and the consequence has been, that drunken people have been turned out into the streets, from the public houses, and great complaints have been made of the annoyance thus caused to respectable and orderly passengers.

Mr. PRYME. — I cannot see why, in the metropolis, those houses known as gin-shops should be open on Sunday mornings before eight o'clock. It can be for no purpose of utility or propriety, but, on the contrary, only for that of the vilest drunkenness, that these gin-shops are open at so early an hour on Sunday mornings as they now are; and I appeal to my Honourable Friend whether it would not be better to keep them closed until one o'clock?

Mr. HAWES. — I think that to fix the hour of eight would obviate all inconvenience.

Mr. KEMBLE. — If the object of the clause, as it stands, is to prevent the scandal of drunken persons being about the streets on Sunday morning, the object will obviously be much better answered by keeping the liquor-shops shut altogether till one o'clock; for, I would ask, in plain common sense, what earthly purpose can persons have in going to gin-shops at six in the morning, but that of getting drunk?

The clause, as amended, was agreed to.

Clause 53. "Publicans not to supply liquor to persons under fourteen years old."

Agreed to.

Clause 54. "Publicans and cook-shop keepers permitting thieves or prostitutes to assemble."

On this clause being put, —

COLONEL SIBTHORP said: — I must object to this clause. Am I to understand that a poor unfortunate woman, if she wants refreshment, is not to go into a public house to get it?

The clause was agreed to.

Clause 55. "Persons keeping cook-shops, &c., and allowing internal communication with an adjoining public house."

Clause 56. "Power to enter unlicensed theatres."

The above clauses were severally agreed to.

Clause 57. "Places used for bear baiting, cock fighting, &c."

On this clause being put, —

COLONEL SIBTHORP said: — I should like to know whether this clause is to extend to such a place as the Hippodrome? for, if so, you might as well extend it at once to hunting and shooting, and all the amusements of the people.

The clause was agreed to.

Clause 58. "Commissioners empowered to authorise superintendents of police to enter gaming-houses."

Clause 59. "Extension of 5 Geo. IV. c. 83. to all gaming in the streets, &c."

Clause 60. "Proof of gaming for money, &c. not necessary in support of informations for gaming."

The above clauses were severally agreed to.

Clause 61. "Extension of 39 & 40

Geo. III. c. 99. s. 21. from twelve years to sixteen years."

On this clause being put, —

Mr. HAWES said: — I entertain an objection to this clause. The pawnbrokers carry on their business under a special Act of Parliament; and I think that, when a particular trade is regulated by one law, you should, if the practice of that trade require alteration, amend the law itself; but that you ought not to effect your alteration by a clause in another Act. If it be necessary or expedient to alter or amend the law relating to pawnbrokers, do this by means of a Bill to amend the Pawnbrokers Act; but do not bring the trade under the provisions of a Bill for the general regulation of your police. Entertaining this view, I shall move that so much of this clause as relates to pawnbrokers be omitted.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — There is no very material alteration on this point contemplated. All that is proposed to be done by this clause is, to extend the law, as it at present stands, with relation to the age of young persons from whom the pawnbrokers are permitted to take pledges, from the age of twelve to that of sixteen years.

Mr. LAW. — But the proposed alteration may be productive of great practical inconvenience to many poor persons who are compelled to resort to the pawnbroker for temporary accommodation. Suppose the case of poor parents in sickness, and having no other agent to send to the pawnbroker's than a son or a daughter of fifteen years old. The consequence will be, that they cannot obtain the necessary assistance on account of the messenger being a few months under the requisite age.

Mr. HAWES. — The point I raise is this; — is it wise to place a regulation affecting this trade in one Act of Parliament, when they have a specific Act for their own trade. I repeat, if you want to amend or alter the law on the subject, do it by amending the Pawnbrokers Act.

The clause was then agreed to.

Clause 62. Extending the provisions of 39 Geo. III. c. 58. (local) to the metropolitan police district.

On the motion of Mr. GOULBURN, this clause was struck out.

Clause 63. "Commissioners of police to regulate the route and conduct of persons driving stage carriages, &c. during the hours of divine service."

Clause 64. "Regulations for preventing obstructions in the streets during public processions, &c."

Clause 65. "Proprietors of stage carriages not liable to penalties for deviating from route."

The above clauses were severally agreed to.

Clause 66. "Prohibition of nuisances in the public streets and thoroughfares."

On this clause being put, —

Mr. FOX MAULE said: — The several nuisances enumerated in this clause are, most of them, provided for by 60 Geo. III. c. 9. The first of them is that of exposing horses for sale.

SIR EDWARD KNATCHBULL. — I really think that that provision is unnecessary and objectionable.

Mr. HAWES. — Such a clause is in almost every local Act.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — You cannot break carriage horses, properly, unless you drive them about the streets; and I hope that the words "or break" will be omitted.

The section was then agreed to.

Sections 2. and 3. were severally agreed to.

On section 4. of the clause ("Riding on carriages without reins, &c.") being put, —

Mr. FOX MAULE said: — I propose, here, to introduce a section, providing against children and others getting up and riding behind carriages, — a practice by which several lamentable accidents have lately occurred.

The remaining sections were severally put, and agreed to, with verbal amendments. The clause, as amended, was then put, and agreed to.

Clause 67. "Drunkards guilty of indecent behaviour may be imprisoned."

On this clause being put, —

Digitized by Google

Mr. GOULBURN said: — This clause is a grave and serious alteration in the law, and surely the operation of it is too harsh. There might be cases where the offence would be really venial, and the magistrate himself would not wish to inflict so severe a punishment.

Mr. HAWES. — In very many of the cases of this kind, which come before the police magistrates, the parties are of the rank and fortune which render a pecuniary fine no punishment whatever, — persons of a grade in society who ought to set a far better example. Now, I think, under such circumstances, this clause is most imperatively called for; and, if it pass, the breakers of the law, in this respect, will understand that if they think proper to play their drunken and indecent pranks in future, they will be punished in a way that they will deem, perhaps, not quite so light as a slight pecuniary fine.

Mr. GOULBURN. — That I should have no objection to, if the clause were confined to such cases; for I fully admit, that when persons of education, and moving in the higher ranks, so far forget themselves as to be guilty of outrages on public decorum, they richly merit to be punished with severity. But take the case of a person moving in the lower ranks of life, who, at a meeting of his friends, has had a little too much drink; — it seems harsh to visit him with such a severe imprisonment for some undesigned indecency.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — The Right Honourable Gentleman mistakes the operation of the clause. The magistrate will still retain the power of inflicting the usual pecuniary fine, as before; but if the individual brought before him be in that situation that a fine of five shillings will be no punishment whatever upon him, then the magistrate is to have power to inflict that which shall be really a punishment, and which the offender will deserve much more than the poorer and more ignorant man. This clause gives a discretionary power to the magistrate; he has still power to inflict the fine of 5s., if he shall think the circumstances of the case warrant him in doing so. I think this clause will be very advantageous, and it will also apply to other cases not fit for the ears of this assembly.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — I would propose, then, to insert these words: — "Provided that such person be not a labouring man."

Mr. FOX MAULE. — The effect of which would be, to allow all the labouring men in the country to get drunk with impunity.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON. — But this clause seems rather to be directed against persons than against offences.

Mr. HAWES. — The evidence of almost all the magistrates before the committee was, that there was no adequate punishment against offenders of a certain class, who, when drunk, committed certain offences. Unless this summary method be adopted, there can be no protection for the public against the drunken frolics of men whose fortunes enable them to laugh at a pecuniary fine.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON. — I should like to know from the Honourable Gentleman who inveighs so much against rich drunkards, what he would do in the case of a rich man who indecently exposes his person when sober, — which is the more disgusting offence of the two. Surely the fine of 40s. — which I find is the penalty in the 11th section of Clause 66. — is not an adequate punishment for that? Why is not this man to be sent for fourteen days to prison? Again, why is not the rich man who furiously rides or drives, so as to endanger life and limb, to be sent for fourteen days to hard labour and confinement?

Mr. GOULBURN. — This is an attempt to introduce into the whole system of law a distinction which never was recognised before. If we are, according to the theory of the Honourable Member for Lambeth, to have grades of punishment applicable to ranks, — from the richest man to the poorest, — then he ought not to begin with a limited district in and about the metropolis, without extending his principle throughout the country; and, also, if his principle be a right one, it ought not to be applied to the offence of drunkenness alone, but to all the crimes of society.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — The Right Honourable Gentleman knows perfectly well, that, if a Bill were to be introduced, extending throughout the country, and pretending to regulate crimes and punishments on a new scale, it would be obnoxious to a vast number of objections; every part of it would be found fault with and criticised, and the end would be, that no such Bill would be likely to pass. Now, if I see that there can be made a practical amendment of the law in one particular instance, it is scarcely a valid objection against that amendment, to say, that the principle is a good one, and ought to be extended throughout the whole law. This House knows perfectly well that there have been, recently, many instances — not three, four, or five, but instances constantly occurring, in the streets of London — of persons of rank, in a state of drunkenness, assaulting and injuring peaceable passengers while in the pursuit of their lawful occupations. Now, these offenders have been hitherto liable to only a small pecuniary fine, amounting to, perhaps, not a fiftieth part of what they had been expending in the course of the same evening on their dinner or supper, and wine. Here you have entirely a different case from that of a poor man, who is fined 5*s*., and, perhaps, sent to prison because he cannot pay it. The Noble Lord the Member for Liverpool asks, "if the principle of this clause be a good one, why not extend it to other offences" which he instanced? But this happens to be the most common offence, and that which most calls for a summary jurisdiction such as that which is proposed. With regard to the offence of indecently exposing the person, there certainly are instances in which compromises have taken place; but there are likewise many cases in which persons have been indicted, and severe punishment inflicted. Here is however, the case of an offence well known to be of frequent occurrence, which has often been attended with serious consequences; and police constables have been much injured in the execution of their duty by these drunken revellers: it is time something should be done; and I see no valid objection to the clause.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON. — It is not too much to expect, when we find a certain principle pervading one of a series of acts, that the same principle should pervade the whole. For example: I find, in the 18th section of Clause 66., that "every person who shall wilfully and wantonly disturb any inhabitant by pulling or ringing any door-bell, or knocking at any door, without lawful excuse, or who shall wilfully and unlawfully extinguish the light of any lamp," is subjected to a penalty of 40*s*. for every such offence. Now, these identical persons against whom most of the observations and strictures that have been made were directed, have been often brought before the magistrates for the offences I have just read from the clause; and those magistrates have much regretted they had not the power of inflicting a greater punishment than they had by law. And I must add, with respect to the two offences of indecent exposure of the person and furious riding or driving, that they ought to be included in this clause, so as to be brought within the punishment of the fourteen days' hard labour.

Mr. WALLACE. — Drunkenness is mostly the cause of the other offences which have been particularly alluded to. It has been said that this measure extends only to a certain district in and around London; but are we not looking forward to the institution of a system of police throughout the entire country?

I think the police force ought to be so extended; and I think, also, we ought to adhere to this clause.

Mr. T. HOBHOUSE. — The distinction between offences in this and the preceding clauses seems to be simply this: — the exposure of the person, when the individual is sober, is only visited with a fine of 40*s*.; but, when accompanied by drunkenness, — which is, perhaps, the less disgusting or more palliated misdemeanour of the two, — the offender is condemned to fourteen days' hard labour. Thus, the Noble Lord is not comparing the difference of punishment between a rich man and a poor man, but between a rich man and a rich man. The object of the Noble Lord was to show that a rich man who should expose himself when sober was to receive a less punishment than for the same action when drunk. I must repeat that the Noble Lord was not comparing the case of the rich and the poor man, but the case of the rich man and the rich man with respect to very different circumstances.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Nothing has been said against the principle of the clause.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON. — I never did object to the clause at all. But I say that you have no right to erect this particular vice of drunkenness so conspicuously as the object of your penalties, when other offences of greater enormity and indecency are passed over more leniently.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — With relation to the limits of this Act, it strikes me as an enormous absurdity, that, anywhere within fifteen miles of where we are now sitting, a man, if he get drunk, is to be sent for fourteen days to prison and hard labour; while, if he go a quarter of a mile further, he shall find no such rule in existence. I beg to say that, when the question is put, I shall take the sense of the House on this objection.

Mr. DARBY. — It does appear ridiculous, that, if a man travel down to Windsor or Brighton, he may get drunk for the forfeit of 5*s.*; but if he commit the same offence in London, he is to be sent for fourteen days to prison. If there be a division, I shall divide with the Honourable Member for Finsbury.

The committee then divided upon the question, "That the clause stand part of the Bill: — Ayes 75; Noes 7; — Majority 66.

Clause 68. "Prohibition of other nuisances."

Upon this clause being put, —

Mr. DARBY said: — I object to there being one principle of law in London and another in the country, which will be the effect of the clause as it stands.

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — It certainly appears to me that, if the principle be good in one case, it is equally so in the other, and that it is as good for the city of London as for the police district included in this Bill.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — It is intended that these clauses should extend to the city of London, as well as to other places. It is not the intention that a man should commit an offence in the city of London with impunity, for which he would be liable to punishment if committed elsewhere.

Mr. W. WILLIAMS. — The Honourable Gentleman, who has just spoken, forgets that the city of London is entirely exempted from the operation of this Act; therefore, the penalties affixed by these clauses to petty offences do not extend to the city of London. I believe, indeed, the Noble Lord will not venture to attempt such an extension, or he would be again frightened out of it the next day, and be counselled by the Honourable Alderman below me (Sir M. Wood) to abandon it, in order to conciliate the good will of the citizens of London.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — The clauses which relate to nuisances, and petty offences of that nature, will extend to the city of London. It is intended that the city police shall have the same power as to these matters, under the new Bill, which they have now under the existing law.

LORD GRANVILLE SOMERSET. — Perhaps the Honourable Gentleman will make a motion to extend the operation of these clauses to the city of London, now? We should then know that we were legislating for all places alike.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I think it would be better to move clauses to that effect, on bringing up the Report.

Digitized by Google

Mr. LAW. — That will be a violation of the pledge already given to the city. It has been promised that the principle of the new enactment shall not be introduced into the city; but it now seems to be intended to introduce the substance of it in details.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — That pledge applied to the management of the police force, which will be left with the city. But there was no pledge to exempt the city from any changes that Parliament might think fit to make in the criminal law.

SIR MATTHEW WOOD. — The Honourable Member for Coventry supposes that I would oppose the introduction of clauses into the London Police Bill for extending this part of the enactment to the city. I can only say that if the Noble Lord, who has the management of the Bill, had proposed such clauses, there would have been no objection made to them by me.

Mr. GOULBURN. — I think it is fortunate that these enactments of the House are not brought under the notice of the colonial Legislatures; for I find, in a despatch of Lord Glenelg to the Governor of Barbadoes, that he objected to an Act that had been passed by the Legislature of that colony, under which persons who permitted dancing in their houses, or other noisy amusements, were to be punished. This clause takes cognizance of offences almost analogous; for we find that people are to be punished for blowing horns in the streets, or shaking a mat at the door. Lord Glenelg said, with respect to the Barbadoes Act, that he could not consent to give powers which might be so easily abused, even to a stipendiary magistrate of a colony. Do you not think, then, that, if this Bill were submitted to the Legislature of that colony, they would feel some degree of astonishment?

The clause was then agreed to.

Clauses 69. to 83. inclusive, were severally put, and agreed to.

Clause 84. ("If penalty is not paid, offender may be committed") was struck out.

The remaining clauses of the Bill were then agreed to. The House resumed; Bill to be reported to-morrow.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

On the motion of the ATTORNEY GENERAL, Order of the Day for the committee on this Bill read. On the question being put, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair," —

Mr. SHEPPARD said: — Sir, I rise, according to my notice, to move, That it be an instruction to the committee that they have power to receive a clause to provide "that the judgment required by the beforesaid Act, previous to a debtor's discharge, subjecting any property that may otherwise accrue to the debtor, at any period (exclusive of all assets, prospects, and claims set forth in his schedule), shall cease to be of effect beyond the term of three years from the date of the discharge of the debtor." I am induced to offer this clause to the consideration of the House, under the impression that the Imprisonment for Debt Bill, — which was passed as a measure of mercy to the debtor, — has been much less so than was expected by its promoters. That provision of the existing Act which makes all property that an insolvent debtor may become possessed of, at any after-period of his life, liable to the payment of his debts, does appear to me to be even less merciful than the old law of debtor and creditor; and I feel that it is in every way so opposed to justice and humanity, that I can scarcely suppose that the House will refuse to apply a remedy.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — Nothing, Sir, would give me greater pleasure, after the good feeling which the Honourable Gentleman has shown in bringing forward this clause, than to be enabled to concur in it; but I feel it my duty, though reluctantly, to oppose the motion. In the first place, the House must recollect that this is not a general Bill to revise and amend the Imprisonment for Debt Abolition Act of last year. It is brought in for a distinct and specific purpose, — namely, to remove that great hardship which is inflicted by the Act I have mentioned on the proprietors of newspapers, by compelling them to insert in their papers, advertisements of any length, for the very small remuneration of 3*s.*, to the exclusion of more profitable matter. If the Honourable Member for Frome feels so strongly upon this matter, the better course for him would be to bring in a distinct Bill for amending the Act of last year; the subject would then be fairly and directly brought before the House, and receive that discussion to which it is entitled. I apprehend, however, that the Honourable Gentleman would find more difficulties in the way of his proposition than he appears to imagine. For my own part, I should be delighted to see the honest debtor freed from his liabilities, and, upon a fair surrender of his property, left to pursue the paths of honest industry unfettered; but it cannot be denied that there are, at all times, many fraudulent debtors, who would, by such a law as that the Honourable Member proposes, be enabled to defraud their creditors, and set them at defiance. I think, too, that the existing law is not quite so severe upon the debtor as the Honourable Gentleman seems to suppose; for the creditor has not, now, the power of coming upon the property which an insolvent debtor may acquire after his insolvency, by his own authority; — that power rests with the Insolvent Debtors Court. Under the judgment, the creditor has no remedy; all he can do is, to make an application to the court; and the court will interfere, or not, at its own discretion. If it should appear that effects have accumulated to the debtor, which might be properly distributed among the creditors, in discharge of their claims, the court can make an order accordingly. But the authority of the court always stands as a protection to the debtor against any injustice on the part of the creditor. Therefore, under all the circumstances of the case, I feel it my duty to resist the Honourable Member's motion.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I quite agree with the Honourable and Learned Gentleman who has just sat down, that it would not be fair to the great mass of creditors in the country, to admit such a clause as that now proposed, without sufficient notice being given to them, by any other means than by a Bill brought in for that specific purpose. The object which the Honourable Gentleman has in view may be a very proper and praiseworthy object; but it should be considered that there is a very large number of creditors, who are interested in such an alteration of the existing law of debtor and creditor, and who are entitled to that notice which the introduction, and passing through its various stages, of a specific Bill on this subject would give them. I trust the Honourable Member will see the propriety of withdrawing his motion.

Mr. SHEPPARD. — Seeing the little chance I should have of success, were I to carry my motion to a division, I will not trouble the House by pressing the introduction of the clause; and will ask leave to withdraw it.

The motion was then, by leave, withdrawn.

Mr. BAINES. — Sir, I rise to move, That it be an instruction to the committee, that they have power to receive certain clauses for the purpose of carrying out more effectually the intentions of the Act of last year. As the law now stands, it is necessary for persons who may be confined in county gaols for debt, to come up to London to put in sureties before they can be liberated. The consequence of this restriction is, that many persons are lying in the various gaols throughout the country, because they are not able to incur the expense of bringing their sureties up to London,—where, alone, the bail can be received. In York, alone, there are fifty-six persons thus confined. The object I have in view is, to give the debtor an opportunity of putting in bail in the country, instead of compelling him to come up to London for that purpose. The clauses that I wish to have introduced in committee are as follow: —

"And whereas it is expedient that persons residing at a distance greater than ten miles from the Court-house in Portugal Street, who may be willing to enter into recognizances of sureties for the due appearance of insolvent debtors before the court, or before commissioners on their circuits, or before justices of the peace in Berwick upon Tweed, should be enabled to enter into such recognizances without the necessity of appearing for such purpose before the court itself at its usual and ordinary place of sitting; be it therefore enacted, that the chief commissioner, and other the commissioners of the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors for the time being, shall, and may, by one or more commission or commissions under the seal of the said court, from time to time, as occasion shall require, empower such and so many fit and proper persons as they shall think necessary in all and every the several towns and counties within England and Wales, and the town of Berwick upon Tweed, to take and receive all and every the recognizance or recognizances of sureties into which any persons shall be willing to enter for the due appearance of insolvent debtors, according to such several and respective recognizances, and in such form as the court, in pursuance of the statute in that behalf, may and shall direct and require.

"Be it further enacted, that in any case of a prisoner, whose estate and effects shall have been, or shall hereafter be, by order of the Court for Relief of Insolvent Debtors, vested in the provisional or other assignee, and who shall be confined in the gaol of any county, town, or place, other than in London, Southwark, Middlesex, or Surrey, and who shall have filed his schedule in the said court, according to the statute in that behalf, it shall and may be lawful for any person or persons who may be willing to enter into such recognizances as before mentioned, whose usual and ordinary place of residence shall be distant more than ten miles from the Court-house in Portugal Street, London, to appear before a person duly appointed and empowered in manner aforesaid, and there to enter into and acknowledge such recognizance of sureties for the due appearance of the insolvent, according to such forms and in such terms and manner as shall or may be prescribed by the said court; which said recognizances of sureties, so taken as aforesaid, shall be transmitted and filed in the said court, with an affidavit of the due taking of the said recognizances of such sureties by some credible person present at the taking thereof, upon payment of such fees as have been usually received for the taking of recognizances in the said court; which recognizances so taken, transmitted, and filed, shall be of the like force and effect as if the same were taken before the said court: for the taking of every such recognizance of sureties, the person or persons so empowered shall receive only the sum or fee of two shillings and sixpence, and no more.

"And be it enacted, that the commissioners of the said court shall make such rules and orders, regulating the amount, and for the taking of such recognizances, as to them shall seem meet, so as such sureties be not compelled to appear in person in the said court to justify themselves; but the same may and is hereby directed to be determined before the said court, or a commissioner thereof, by affidavit or affidavits duly taken before the person or persons so empowered as aforesaid, who are hereby empowered and required to take the same.

"And be it enacted, that any commissioner of the said court, on his circuits, shall and may take and receive all and every such recognizance or recognizances of sureties as any person or persons shall be willing to make and acknowledge before him; which, being transmitted, shall, without oath, be filed in manner aforesaid, upon payment of the usual fees."

"And be it enacted, that as soon as such sureties shall have justified by affidavit, in manner aforesaid, and such recognizances as hereinbefore mentioned shall have been filed, the said court shall thereupon issue a warrant to the gaoler for the discharge of such insolvent from custody accordingly, and who shall have such and the like privileges, and be subject to such and the like liabilities, as the statute in that behalf directs."

The ATTORNEY GENERAL.—I rise, with much pleasure, to second the motion of the Honourable Member for Leeds. I approve of his proposition entirely; indeed, I could not do otherwise, because, in point of fact, the object of it is to carry more completely into effect the Bill in which I took so much interest last year. I second the motion, which I understand to be an instruction to the committee to alter the title of the Bill, and to insert certain clauses, &c.

Upon the question being put, "That it be an instruction to the committee, that they have power to receive such clauses,"—

Mr. WARBURTON said:—I think, Sir, if this motion be agreed to, the Honourable Member for Frome will have good cause to complain. The object of this Bill, according to its title and contents, is merely to give relief to the proprietors of newspapers, who are now compelled to insert in their papers advertisements relating to estates of insolvent debtors, of any length, at one certain fixed price. That is a matter of detail not at all relating to the main object of the Imprisonment for Debt Act. The clauses now proposed, like that which has been submitted by the Honourable Member for Frome, relate to the substance of that Act, and are intended to effect an alteration in it. I do not say that the relief which these clauses propose to give to the debtor in country gaols may not be proper; but it is totally foreign to the professed object of this Bill, and, like the clause of the Honourable Gentleman opposite, ought to form the subject of another Bill to amend the Act of last year.

Mr. JERVIS.—I apprehend that the object of the Bill now before us is to remedy certain defects in the Act of last year. But the object of the new clause proposed by the Honourable Member opposite (Mr. Sheppard) was, to free the insolvent from the liability attaching to his future attained property;—that would have been an alteration in the principle of that Act, as well as a departure from that of the previously existing law; for, by that law, the insolvent was still liable, in any property he might become possessed of subsequent to his insolvency. The clauses which the Honourable Member for Leeds has submitted are for the purpose of enabling persons residing in the country to put in bail without incurring the expense of bringing their sureties up to London. This, then, is a mere alteration of detail, and not of principle; and I trust the House will allow it to be incorporated with this Bill.

CAPTAIN PECHELL. — I hope no objection will be made to the introduction of this clause. It has been called for by all parties; and it is a well-known fact that many persons are at this time confined in gaols in the country, merely because they have not the means of coming up to London to put in bail.

Mr. T. B. HOBHOUSE. — I agree with the Honourable Member for Bridport, that, however desirable these clauses may be, it is not proper that they should form a part of the Bill now under consideration. This Bill is for the specific purpose of freeing the proprietors of newspapers from a certain liability to which they are now subject; but if you admit these clauses, you will be introducing a matter relating to imprisonment for debt. I think the Honourable and Learned Attorney General is acting somewhat inconsistently in admitting these clauses, after having refused to entertain the proviso which the Honourable Member for Frome just now proposed. These clauses are inconsistent with the preamble of the Bill.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL. — The moment the words are struck out of the preamble, which my Honourable Friend proposes to strike out, these clauses may very properly be introduced.

The motion was then put, and agreed to; clauses inserted; Bill considered in committee; to be reported to-morrow.

PERTH PRISON (APPLICATION OF MONEY FROM THE CONSOLIDATED FUND).

Resolution reported,—"That a sum, not exceeding 10,000*l.*, be advanced out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, towards defraying the expense of converting into a prison the buildings at Perth, now belonging to Government, and formerly used as a place of confinement for French prisoners of war."

Resolution agreed to; instruction to the Committee on Prisons (Scotland) Bill, that they have power to make provision therein accordingly.

WAYS AND MEANS — SUGAR DUTIES.

Resolution reported,—"That, towards raising the supply granted to her Majesty, the several duties on sugar and molasses now payable, and the bounties allowed thereon, be further continued."

Resolution agreed to; Bill ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and Mr. BARING. Bill for granting to her Majesty certain duties on sugar imported into the United Kingdom for the service of the year 1839, presented, and read a first time; to be read a second time on Monday next; and to be printed.

HIGH SHERIFFS' EXPENSES BILL.

On the motion of COLONEL DAVIES, the Order of the Day for third reading, read.

Upon the question being put, "That this Bill be now read a third time," —

SIR E. KNATCHBULL said: — This, Sir, is a Bill of much consequence; and, although many of its provisions are most objectionable, it has passed on to the third reading, by some accident or other, without discussion. I hope, under these circumstances, the Honourable and Gallant Member will not press on the third reading at this late hour.

COLONEL DAVIES. — I really cannot consent to postpone this Bill: it has gone regularly through its previous stages, and has been regularly noticed in the votes of the House; therefore, that no discussion has been raised upon it, cannot be laid to my charge.

SIR E. KNATCHBULL. — As the Honourable and Gallant Member is determined to press his motion, it becomes my duty to oppose the third reading of this Bill; and I think, Sir, the House will agree with me, that a Bill of so much importance, and which has hitherto escaped general observation, ought not to be pressed through its final stage without some opportunity of discussing it being given to us. I am not aware whether the Government intend to support this Bill, or not; but this I know, that many of the clauses are very objectionable. I have heard no statement from the Honourable and Gallant Member, to prove that it is necessary to take these expenses off the sheriffs, and to throw the whole burden on the county rates, as his Bill proposes. But there are various inconsistencies in the clauses: — one is, that the high sheriff is to have the appointment of the javelin-men and trumpeters; while the county is to pay for them. Then, again, the judges' lodgings are to be paid for by the county. I certainly shall divide the House against the passing of such a Bill, at this hour of the night; and, accordingly, I will move, as an amendment, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the question add the words "this day six months."

Question proposed, "That the word proposed to be left out, stand part of the question."

Mr. BARNEBY. — I was in some degree favourable to the Bill that was brought in for a similar purpose on a former occasion; but further reflection convinces me that we ought not, by an Act of Parliament, to prevent the high sheriffs from paying those expenses to which they have hitherto been subject. The second clause of this Bill requires that the sheriff shall appoint javelin-men and trumpeters, who are to be paid and clothed by the county. Now, I object strongly to giving the sheriff this patronage, if he is to be freed from the expense. The third clause, which provides that lodgings shall be provided for the judges at the expense of the county, I do not think so objectionable; though I do not see why the provision should be made by the clerk of the peace. But to the third clause I wish especially to direct the attention of the Honourable Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department. Its objectionable tendency was first brought to my notice by Mr. Phillips, of the Home Office, who told me that he did not believe the Government would allow the Bill to pass unless that clause was expunged. The words of the clause are, "No sheriff shall be required to proceed from, or leave the town in which the assize is to be held, for the purpose of meeting the judge or judges of assize." The law of the land requires that the sheriff shall go out to meet the judges, and escort them into the town wherein the assize is to be held.

And in many cases — that of a riot for instance — this protection might be absolutely necessary; yet here is a clause that prohibits the sheriff from affording it; and I have only to add, that I shall support my Right Honourable Friend in his opposition to the third reading of the Bill.

COLONEL DAVIES. — This Bill was agreed to by the committee which sat upon the subject; and of those Members of that committee who were favourable to the Bill, the Honourable Member who has just spoken was one. Indeed, the Honourable Member was the author of one of the clauses. I am, therefore, at some loss to conceive what has occurred to change his opinion. The Right Honourable Baronet (Sir E. Knatchbull) asks for some statement to prove the necessity for the Bill. I can only say, that it was the opinion of the select committee to which I have alluded, that it is my own opinion, and I believe that of the great majority of persons both in the House and out of doors, that gentlemen who are called upon to perform the very onerous and unpaid duties of high sheriffs ought not to be required to pay such expenses as those which it is the object of this Bill to exempt them from. Considering the manner in which this Bill has been received, and that it has been allowed to proceed on to the third reading without opposition, I cannot believe that the House will now reject it. I shall therefore persist in carrying my motion to a division.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I can only say, that I shall vote for the third reading; and for this reason, — that I think it is an unnecessary hardship to inflict upon gentlemen — perhaps of small fortunes — who may be called upon to fill the office of sheriff, that they should have to bear these expenses. I should state, however, that if the House should agree to the third reading, I shall feel it my duty to object to the passing of the fourth clause, and shall move that that clause be omitted.

Mr. DARBY. — By the clauses of this Bill, the sheriff is not obliged to give any fee to any officer, but he may make an allowance if he think proper. He is not now obliged to do so; though if he choose, he may, even without this Bill. This Bill leaves the law in this respect just as it now stands. The Honourable and Gallant Member has done nothing at all by this Bill. Many of the expenses and fees are refused to be paid by sheriffs, now. In Sussex there is a distinct sheriff's fund; and by applying to this fund, the sheriff may get rid of many of the expenses attendant upon the office. The Bill provides for no alteration, except as to the place of meeting the judge; and it appears to me so utterly inefficient, and so very objectionable, that I shall feel it my duty to oppose it.

Mr. J. JERVIS. — In my opinion, the Bill does not go far enough in its enacting clauses. In the second clause, it is provided that javelin-men shall be appointed by the sheriff, in number not less than 10 nor more than 22. And it is also provided that they shall be paid and clothed by the clerk of the peace out of the county rates. But is he to provide them with new clothes every year? if not, he might find that one sheriff would appoint men six feet high, while another would appoint men five feet high as javelin-men: and again, if there be no restriction, the sheriff might change his javelin-men three or four times during his year, and thus put the county to the expense of providing clothes three or four times within the year. The Noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) objects to the fourth clause, which I think the most useful of the whole. By the existing law, the sheriff is compelled to go out and meet the judge, and provide a carriage to convey him into the town; and if the judge is dissatisfied with the carriage so provided for him, he may inflict a fine upon the sheriff. This is a great hardship; and in some of the counties of Wales, where the class of country gentlemen, from whom the sheriffs are chosen, do not keep carriages, and where carriages are not very easily obtained, it is a very serious inconvenience, and makes those persons very reluctant to undertake the office. It is not very long since that a case occurred in Merionethshire, in which the sheriff was fined by the judge. The sheriff had hired the best carriage he could obtain in the neighbourhood to convey the judge into the assize town; but the judge, not feeling satisfied with it, fined the sheriff 20*l.*, — which fine was levied. The sheriff memorialised the judge on the subject, and the grand jury did the same, — stating the fact, that the carriage that had been provided was the best the neighbourhood afforded, — but without effect: subsequently the Treasury was memorialised; and their reply was, that they saw no reason whythe fine should be remitted.

Mr. PARROTT. — The office of sheriff is one that is forced upon the party who may be chosen, — it is not sought after by him; and surely it is not just to tax a man, upon whom you impose duties of a very extensive and onerous nature, with these heavy expenses — frequently amounting to several hundred pounds — in addition. I trust the House will not refuse to pass the measure.

The House then divided on the original question: — Ayes 40; Noes 16; — Majority 24.

The Bill was then read a third time.

Upon the question being put, "That the Bill do now pass," —

Mr. T. B. HOBHOUSE said: — I object to the first clause in this Bill, which, in my opinion, is absurd, — its only object being to declare that the sheriff shall not be required to do that which he is not now, by law, required to do. The clause should either be made compulsory, or be omitted altogether. I would rather it were omitted.

Mr. J. JERVIS. — Perhaps it would be more regular to allow me, in the first place, to move an amendment on the clause. I move that words be inserted to provide that the sheriff shall not be required to provide a carriage for the judges.

The amendment was then put, and agreed to.

Mr. BARNEBY. — I have an objection to urge against the second clause, and intend to take the sense of the House upon it. By that clause the sheriffs are empowered to appoint their own dependents, as javelin-men, and to call upon the county to pay and clothe those men. This is so unjust in principle, that I feel it cannot stand for a moment. I beg to move the omission of the clause; that is, to leave out from the word "present," in line 1. to the word "and," in line 28.

Question put, — "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

Mr. DARBY. — By the clause as it stands, the sheriff might change the javelin-men at each assizes, and thus come upon the county for pay and clothing for two sets of men.

Mr. F. BARING. — The sheriffs are responsible for their officers; and it is, therefore, but fair that they should have the power of appointing such persons as they may think proper. If the objection of the Honourable Member — that the sheriff ought not to appoint officers he does not pay — were good, it would apply to almost every public office in the country.

The House then divided: — Ayes 36; Noes 17; — Majority 19.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I will now move that the latter part of the fourth clause be omitted.

Mr. AGLIONBY. — I think this the most valuable clause in the Bill; and I hope the Noble Lord will, at least, let us know the ground of his objection. We all know that the judge usually travels in his own carriage, and with some state; and surely he does not require the attendance of the sheriff and his javelinmen to attend him into the town in which he may be going to hold the assize.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — This clause renders it imperative on the sheriff to meet the judge at his lodgings in the county town. If, therefore, owing to any disturbance in the county, he were called upon to afford protection to the judge in his progress to the town, it would, under the clause as it stands, be a sufficient answer for the sheriff to say that the Act required him to be in the assize town. I do not see any reason for altering the present law as to this subject, and with this view I have moved the omission of the latter words of the clause.

The question, "That certain words be omitted from the clause," was then put, and agreed to. Bill passed.

SLAVE TRADE.

On the motion of CAPTAIN PECHELL, Copy ordered, — "of the Memorial to the Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury, from Mr. Joseph Woodhead, on behalf of the commander, officers, and crew of her Majesty's brig Buzzard, as captors of the Spanish schooner Circe, of 98 tons, condemned under the late treaty, being illegally fitted for the traffic in slaves, and declared to be 38 tons British admeasurement."

STANNARIES COURTS (CORNWALL).

On the motion of SIR C. LEMON, — Bill "to make further Provision for the Administration of Justice, and for improving the Practice and Proceedings in the Courts of the Stannaries of Cornwall, and for the Prevention of Frauds by Workmen employed in Mines, within the County of Cornwall," — ordered to be brought in by SIR CHARLES LEMON, Mr. PENDARVES, and Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL. Bill subsequently presented; to be read a first time; to be read a second time on Monday next; and to be printed.

PAYMENT OF RATES.

Mr. PRYME. — I rise, to move — according to the notice that I have given — for leave to bring in a Bill for the more effectual relief of poor persons from the payment of rates or cesses.

Upon the question being put, —

SIR E. KNATCHBULL said: — I believe, Sir, it is not usual to give leave to bring in a Bill of this nature, without the House being put in possession of its character and bearing. If the Honourable Member persist in his motion at this late hour, I shall move, as an amendment, that the House do adjourn.

Mr. BROTHERTON. — As the Honourable Gentleman, yesterday, objected to a most effectual Bill on this subject, I shall support the motion that the House do now adjourn.

Question put, — "That this House do now adjourn."

Mr. PRYME. — This is the same Bill as passed through two stages last Session; and the reason I did not make any statement, to-night, was, that I was anxious to save the time of the House. I am, however, quite ready to do so, if the House is disposed to hear me.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I think, as there is an objection to the Honourable Member's motion, he had better defer it till another evening.

Mr. PRYME. — I will defer it, then, till to-morrow.

Motion and original motion were then severally, by leave, withdrawn.

THE POOR LAW COMMISSION CONTINUANCE.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I rise to ask leave to bring in two Bills with regard to the Poor Law Amendment Act. I have already stated that, at this period of the Session, I think it is too late to introduce the measure which I originally intended to bring forward, as that comprises a very extensive detail, and touches upon matters which have been much discussed both in the House and before the select committee. All, therefore, that I at present wish to do is, to prevent the Poor Law Commission from being suddenly put an end to. Accordingly, I propose to extend the power of the Poor Law Commissioners for a year longer than it would, otherwise, exist by law. I likewise wish to bring in a Bill for amending the laws for the assessment and collection of rates for the relief of the poor, and for the collection of county, borough, and police rates. Great inconvenience is now experienced in the collection of rates, owing to the different authorities in this respect which are vested in the overseers and in the guardians. It is my object to make the system uniform, by giving to the guardians the power of assessing and collecting the county rates, as well as the rates levied under the Poor Law Amendment Act. I move, Sir, for leave to bring in a Bill to continue the Poor Law Commission for one year.

Upon the question being put, —

COLONEL SIBTHORP said: — This is another instance of the Noble Lord's system, on which he promises to do everything; but, in my opinion, and I believe in the opinion of the public, the Noble Lord really, in the end, does nothing at all.

Mr. DARBY. — I regret much, that the Noble Lord has given up the larger measure; and I feel that those who take an interest in this question have some reason to complain of the course now adopted; because, before the adjournment, the Noble Lord said he had prepared a Bill which went into details, and now he says that, in order to save time, he has done — what? Why, consumed more time in preparing these two Bills. I should like to know what is to be done with respect to the bastardy clause?

LORD J. RUSSELL. — That subject will be provided for in the Summary Jurisdictions Bill.

Mr. DARBY. — I hope the necessary amendments in this branch of the law will not be left to depend on the success of a measure, the fate of which is quite uncertain. I know that there are many persons who go much further than myself, in their notions of the amendments which are required in the present Act. I wish merely to go back to the Report of the committee of 1837, in which the special attention of Honourable Members was directed to the cases of widows with children; of men who were married before the Poor Law came into effect, and who had large families; and of persons who were unable to work. And as the proposed Bill is only to last for a year, I think it will be a good opportunity to try to amend the Act in these points. I have had much experience with respect to the working of the Poor Law Bill; and the Noble Lord will do me the credit of saying that I have not factiously opposed it, or used it for any party purpose. I might, at first, have objected to the commissioners; but, as it is now quite impossible to get rid of the system, we must make the best of it. I have, personally, received great attention from one of the commissioners (Mr. Lefevre), whenever I have had occasion to consult him. I have, however, seen so much mischief result from some of the provisions of the existing Act, that I shall be glad to see some amendment in it. I hope, however, that those amendments will not be made to depend upon any measure which is not likely to pass in a short time. The bastardy clause, especially, is so drawn that it is perfectly incomprehensible; — one part is totally inconsistent with the other; and the judges have declared that they could put no certain construction upon it. I hope the Noble Lord will shortly introduce a Bill to clear up the doubts and difficulties which, at present, exist upon these points.

The motion was then agreed to; Bill ordered to be brought in by LORD J. RUSSELL and Mr. FOX MAULE.

Bill subsequently presented, and read a a first time; to be read a second time on Friday next; and to be printed.

COLLECTION OF RATES.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — The next motion is, — for leave to bring in a Bill to amend the laws relating to the assessment and collection of rates for the relief of the poor, and to the collection of county, borough, and police rates.

On the question being put, —

SIR E. KNATCHBULL said: — I am sure the Noble Lord will appreciate the feeling with which we forbear to throw any impediment in his way with respect to these Bills. As to the first Bill, I must say that I exceedingly regret the postponement of the general measure announced by the Noble Lord. I regret that he has not determined to grapple boldly with the difficulty at once. There is one point on which I entertain a very strong opinion, — namely, the necessity of vesting some discretion in the guardians as to giving out-door relief. If the present rigorous system be not somewhat relaxed, I anticipate that very serious difficulties will arise.

The question was then agreed to. Bill subsequently presented, and read a first time; to be read a second time on Friday next, and to be printed

EDUCATION (NATIONAL).

LORD BROUGHAM presented a petition in favour of the plan recommended by the Privy Council, — of inhabitants of Bourn. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

THE LEVANT.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I hope the Noble Viscount will have no objection to relieve the anxiety which is so generally felt in consequence of the late news from the Levant. It is, for very many reasons, most desirable that peace should be preserved in that quarter of the world; and I hope that my Noble Friend will be able to state to the House that the reports and rumours which have recently reached this country, on the subject of impending hostilities in that quarter, are unfounded.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I entertain confident hopes that public tranquillity will be preserved in the countries alluded to: but, as the accounts which have arrived, lately, are of a more menacing character than they formerly were, I cannot answer the Noble and Learned Lord's question so satisfactorily as I wish.

PRINTING OF THE BIBLE (SCOTLAND).

The DUKE of MONTROSE. — I beg leave to present a petition of the senate of the University of Glasgow, taking notice of the approaching termination of the patent of the Queen's printer for Scotland, and praying that some plan may be adopted to secure correct editions of the Bible in future.

The EARL of HADDINGTON. — This is a subject of great interest and importance to the Church of Scotland, and I should wish to know whether I rightly understand the intention of Government with respect to the change they are about to make in the present system of printing the Bible. I believe that liberty is to be given to all persons to print the Bible, but that a certain number are to be appointed, on whom the responsibility will rest to see that the editions printed be conformable with the authorised version?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — I readily admit the great importance of this subject. The object which the Government have in view, by their plan, is, to have the Bible disseminated throughout Scotland as cheaply as possible, and to take care that the price be not enhanced on the plea that a privilege has been granted for the benefit of any particular party. At the same time, it is determined that sufficient care shall be taken to secure, as has hitherto been the case, correct copies of the Bible, which shall be, under proper superintendence, printed exactly according to the authorised version now in use. With that view, the plan which my Noble Friend (Lord J. Russell) has recommended to the Crown is, that a board shall be instituted, consisting of the Lord Advocate for the time being, the Moderator of the General Assembly, two Divines, and two learned laymen, who shall, from time to time, inspect the publication of the sacred writings, in order that the correctness of the copy may be properly certified. It is also proposed that the free importation into Scotland of Bibles printed in England, according to the authorised version, shall be allowed, — such copies being examined and sanctioned by the board; and that, where a copy is transmitted to the board, no fee or reward shall be taken for certifying its correctness.

The EARL of HADDINGTON. — I beg to ask the Noble Viscount whether the Church of Scotland has been consulted on this matter?

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — No.

The EARL of HADDINGTION. — I certainly think that the Church of Scotland ought to be made acquainted with the plan, in order that they may state whether they are friendly to it, or not.

Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

EMIGRATION OF FREE NEGROES.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I wish to ask whether her Majesty's Government have taken any steps, with regard to the Colonial Legislatures of Antigua and Montserrat, to induce them to revoke certain laws which prevent the removal or emigration of free negroes from one island to another. 6*d.* or 7*d.* per day sterling is the amount of wages given at Montserrat and Antigua; whilst the negroes can get 2*s.* 2*d.* in other islands of the West Indies, if they are allowed to emigrate. To prohibit negroes from seeking labour, is to inflict a great hardship upon them.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY.— I cannot say, at this moment, that any steps have been taken to induce the Legislatures of Antigua and Montserrat to reconsider laws passed in 1836, to which the Royal assent was given. This has not been done, because, at the present moment, there would be no advantage in it. I have had communications with different individuals on the subject, who are concerned both with the new and the old colonies. I am aware of the importance of the subject, and shall turn my attention to it.

LORD ASHBURTON.—I think there ought to be no restraint on the negroes, now the apprenticeship is over.

LORD BROUGHAM. — It is necessary to take some precautions to prevent the negroes, who are not so capable of taking care of themselves as white people, from being ill-treated and sold to French or Portuguese colonies. The only limit on emigration that should be allowed should be, to take care that nothing of that kind takes place.

COLONIES LEGISLATION BILL.

UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE, &c.

Petition (National) of the there undersigned, for universal suffrage, ballot, annual parliaments, abolition of property qualification, and remuneration of Members.

Mr. T. ATTWOOD, in presenting this petition (which was rolled in upon a frame, and placed on the floor of the House), said: — In rising to present this very extraordinary and important petition, I am aware that the rules of the House will not allow me to enter upon any general statement on the subjects to which it refers, or go into a defence of the great principles which are therein set forth. I shall, therefore, endeavour to keep within the rules prescribed by the House, by confining myself to a statement of the substance and contents of the petition; and then, perhaps, the House will indulge me by permitting me to say a few words — and only a few words — in explanation of the circumstances attending my own personal position in connection with that petition. The petition originated in the town of Birmingham. It was adopted there at a very numerous meeting on the 6th of August last. It was then forwarded to Glasgow, where, in a short time, it received the signatures of no less than 90,000 honest, industrious men; and it afterwards received the signatures of nearly the same number at Birmingham, and the neighbourhood of that town. I hold in my hand a list of 214 towns and villages, in different parts of Great Britain, where the petition was deliberately adopted and signed; and it is now presented to this House with 1,280,000 signatures, — the result of not less than 500 public meetings, which have been held in support of the principles contained in this petition. At each of those meetings, there was one universal, anxious cry of distress, — distress, I must say, long disregarded by this House, yet existing for years, — distress which has caused much discontent amongst the working people; and which discontent was created by the long sufferings and grievances which that class of the people have endured, and which have been so grievously disregarded by the people's representatives in this House.

[Cries of "Order!"]

I hope the House will listen to what I have to say, and afford due attention to a petition so universally signed. I hope the House will not say, that, because the petitioners are merely humble working men, their opinions should be disregarded, and their grievances allowed to remain unconsidered and unredressed! I sincerely trust that such will not be the case. It would be a most serious offence to those who have signed the petition, if that were to be the result, in the presence of their delegates, who have been allowed to be present to witness its presentation; and it would be most painful for me to have to state such a result, and to carry back a report to those who have intrusted the petition to my hands, that it had been treated with any symptoms of disregard or disrespect by the House. The men who have signed the petition are honest and industrious — of sober and unblemished character, — men who have uniformly discharged the duties of good members of society and loyal subjects, and who have always obeyed the laws. Gentlemen brought up in the lap of luxury, and enjoying the wealth handed down to them by hereditary descent, can have no idea of the privations suffered by the working men of this country. Yet at all the meetings which have been held, by those others, the persons attending them have confined themselves strictly to the legal pursuit of their constitutional rights, for the purpose of remedying the extreme sufferings which they have endured for so many years. No attempt is made to relieve them: whether they be handloom weavers, artisans, or agricultural labourers,—no matter what they may be, — still, for them, there is no relief. They meet with no support, or even sympathy, from this House; and therefore do they feel themselves bound to exercise every legal and constitutional effort within their power, to recover the whole of their constitutional rights. All that these honest men say is, that the Members of this House, opposed to them by birth, parentage, habits of life, wealth, and education, have not shown that anxiety to relieve the sufferings and redress the wrongs of the working classes, which they consider they have a right to demand, and which they expect as British subjects. I hope that no Honourable Member will be at all prejudiced against the petition in consequence of these remarks, or think that the slightest disrespect is intended by them. The petitioners have, for many years, postponed this extreme measure of endeavouring to recover the whole of the ancient rights of the Commons of England. They, their fathers, and grandfathers have waited for many years, trusting to the gentlemen of England to protect them; but no protection having been found in that quarter, they feel themselves compelled to exercise what privileges are left them for the recovery of those which they have lost. The petitioners state that they only want a fair day's wages for a fair day's work; and that, if we cannot give them that, then will they exercise every legal means in their power to change the representation of this House, with a view to the accomplishment of their wishes, — which I sincerely trust they may succeed in. Every one of these honest men produces by his labour four times more to the country than he asks for in exchange, — that is to say, a fair subsistence; and yet their country refuses them one fourth of the value of their labour! Some of them have only three days' wages in the week: yet they are all paying an enormous per centage of debts and taxes. Such being the case, the House will not be surprised to hear that these honest men make use of rather strong language. The first demand contained in the petition is for universal suffrage; in order that representation may be co-equal with taxation — the ancient constitutional law of England. The petitioners state, —

> We are bowed down under a load of taxes, which, notwithstanding, fall greatly short of the wants of our rulers; our traders are trembling on the verge of bankruptcy; our workmen are starving; capital brings no profit, and labour no remuneration; the home of the artificer is desolate, and the warehouse of the pawnbroker is full; the workhouse is crowded, and the manufactory is deserted.

They therefore come before the House to say that the capital of the master must not be deprived of its due reward,—that the labourer must have a return in wages for his labour, — and that the laws which make food dear, and those which, by making money scarce, make labour cheap, must be abolished. The petitioners prefer this demand for universal suffrage, in the language of their forefathers, as expressed in the celebrated petition of rights. They then show that the constitution guarantees freedom of election; they contend that, to secure freedom of election, vote by ballot is absolutely necessary, and that therefore vote by ballot is a constitutional right. They further declare that, agreeably to the Acts of settlement, Parliaments were ordered to be triennial, or more frequent; they therefore ask for annual Parliaments. They say that Members should be paid for their attendance in Parliament, as was the case in the days of Andrew Marvel (a practice, too, which I might now easily establish, if I thought proper, in Birmingham). That was the ancient law: Members were paid by those who sent them to Parliament; and the petitioners are of opinion, that, until that right is restored, they cannot have Members who will properly feel and understand the wants and real interests of the people. The fifth object is, that the property qualification of Members shall be abolished. In all these five points I most cordially agree with the petitioners; and I most sincerely hope, considering the progress of public opinion, that the day is not far distant when the whole of those five points will be granted to the people; and when they will have them in full weight and measure, and no mistake about the matter.

[Laughter.]

SIR G. H. SMYTH. — I rise to order. The Honourable Member is transgressing the rules of the House. It is a distinct rule of the House that no Member shall make a speech on presenting a petition; and I could scarcely have believed that any Member, even with that ridiculous piece of machinery before him, would have been permitted to adopt a course which has been uniformly refused to myself and others.

[Cries of "Chair!" and, "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. — I must certainly say that, according to the rule of the House, no Member has a right to speak at any length on presenting a petition. But when the House considers the particular circumstances connected with this petition, and the position in which the Honourable Member is placed regarding it, they will, perhaps, think that there are grounds for granting some indulgence to the Honourable Member.

[Loud cries of "Hear!"]

SIR G. H. SMYTH. — I, for one, do enter my protest against the course adopted by the Honourable Member for Birmingham, to whom I am not disposed to extend any unusual indulgence.

[Cries of "Oh!"]

Mr. T. ATTWOOD. — I am very thankful for the indulgence which the House has already extended to me, and I shall trespass but a few minutes longer upon its attention, while I say a few words in explanation of my own peculiar situation. Although I most cordially support the prayer of the petition, am ready to support every word contained in it, and am determined to use every means in my power to accomplish the objects it has in view, I must say that many reports have gone abroad respecting arguments said to have been used in support of the petition, on different occasions, which I distinctly disavow. I never, in the whole course of my life, inculcated any doctrine or recommended any means except those of peace, law, order, loyalty, and union; and in recommending these, I have done so in perfect good faith,—not wearing one face out of doors and another in this House, — but always in the same manner and in the same feeling; fairly and openly doing all that I could, as a man, a patriot, and a Christian, to work out the principles which I have maintained, by these and these means only. I wash my hands of any and every appeal to physical force. I deprecate all such notions — I repudiate all talk of arms — I wish for no arms but the will of the people, legally, fairly, and constitutionally expressed; and if the people will only adopt my views and respond to my voice, — if they will send up similar petitions from every parish in England, and go on using every argument which justice, reason, and wisdom dictate, taking care to proceed wisely and discreetly, and to abstain from all insolence and violence, — I am confident they will create such an action in the public mind as will ultimately secure the attentive consideration of this House. It only now remains for me to read to the House the prayer of the petition, which is in these words: —

May it therefore please your Honourable House to take this, our petition, into your most serious consideration, and to use your utmost endeavours, by all constitutional means, to have a law passed, granting to every male, of lawful age, sane mind, and unconvicted of crime, the right of voting for Members of Parliament; and directing all future elections of Members of Parliament to be in the way of secret ballot; and ordaining that the duration of Parliaments so chosen shall, in no case, exceed one year; and abolishing all property qualifications in the Members; and providing for their due remuneration while in attendance on their parliamentary duties.

Mr. JOHN FIELDEN. — I beg leave to say that I cordially support the prayer of the petition.

On the motion of Mr. ATTWOOD, it was ordered that the petition be printed.

Mr. SPEAKER. — Does the Honourable Member intend to found any motion on the petition?

Mr. ATTWOOD. — I do; and I therefore give notice that I shall take the first opportunity, on the question of going into a Committee of Supply, to move that the House resolve itself into a committee of the whole House, for the purpose of taking the petition into consideration.

By LORD VISCOUNT SANDON and other Honourable Members, against the altered plan proposed relative to national education, — from Liverpool; Hawkwell; Hockley; and Rayleigh.

By Mr. P. THOMSON, SIR H. VIVIAN, Mr. B. SMITH, Mr. P. HOWARD, and other Honourable Members, in favour of the proposed plan, — from Stamford; Bisley; Carlisle; Manchester; Norwich; Sunderland (two petitions); St. Ives (Huntingdon) Portsoy; Maryport; Fetter Lane; Saint Austell; members of the East Kent Baptist Association; Preston (two petitions); Mile End; Gosport; members of the central committee of the Religious Freedom Society (two petitions); Bristol; Middlesbrough; Romsey; Bourn; Marton; Hastings and St. Leonard's; Shepton Mallet; Truro; Hinckley; and Chester.

On CAPTAIN ALSAGER presenting a petition from a meeting held at the Horns Tavern, Kennington, against the proposed grant,—

Mr. HAWES said: — Sir, I beg to ask the Honourable Member whether he presents this petition as coming from the meeting over which he, himself (Captain Alsager), lately presided?

CAPTAIN ALSAGER.—I present the petition as the result of the resolutions which were passed at the meeting alluded to.

Mr. HAWES. — Then, Sir, I object to the petition being brought up, because I hold in my hold the petition of the gentleman who was put into the chair after my Honourable Friend had been turned out of it by a majority of those present. This gentleman, who is, himself, of perfect respectability, and the son of a highly respectable county magistrate, states that the majority of the meeting was decidedly opposed to the views of my Honourable Friend, and those who supported him on that occasion; that it was not a public meeting, the parties being only admitted by tickets; and he protests against the petition being received as that of the meeting,— the great majority denying any acquiescence in it. The petitioner further states, that very considerable confusion took place at the meeting, and that the members of the established church who were present were by no means peacemakers on the occasion. My Honourable Friend having represented this as a petition founded on the resolutions passed at that public meeting, I trust the House will consider, under the circumstances, that I am justified in objecting to the petition being received as the petition of the meeting.

Mr. HUME. — Sir, I think the House should first have the petition read, to know whether or not it really does purport to be the petition of the meeting.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL (having looked at the petition). — It purports to be the petition "of the undersigned inhabitants."

Mr. HAWES.— I can only say that my Honourable Friend stated that the petition was founded upon the resolutions passed at the meeting. If it be not called the petition of that meeting, I, of course, have no further objection to its being received.

CAPTAIN ALSAGER. — Sir, I can only repeat what I stated before,—that the petition is the result of the meeting over which I presided. No one was admitted to the meeting without a card similar to the one which I hold in my hand, and which bound all who used it to acquiesce in the decision of the chairman. Out of the 1200 persons who were present, there were about 200 Liberals, who made an incessant noise during the whole time. I endeavoured to give an explanation to them, and to point out to them that the meeting was expressly held to propose and second certain resolutions. Those resolutions were proposed and seconded; and I told the parties that we had not met there to discuss the question. So far from being turned out of the chair, I beg leave to observe that the Honourable Member was not present, or he would not have said so. No person attempted to turn me out of the chair, so long as I chose to remain in it. No person interfered with my sitting there; but, after I found that I was not able to obtain a hearing for the speakers, from the noise that was made, then I certainly did leave the room, accompanied by 500 or 600 persons around me. When I found that I could not get a hearing, I held up the resolutions in large letters, and put them as well as I was able, and was informed by many gentlemen who were there that they were passed by a majority of at least 4 to 1. After I left the chair, there was a rush, by some of the friends of the Liberals, to take possession of it; and one of them, who was more vigorous than the rest, coming on the platform, was immediately taken into the committee room by some of my friends, when he said that he had come there only as a listener. When they had all left, and it was dark, the lights having been put out, Mr. Curling took the chair, and a scene of riot and confusion took place. Some thoughts were entertained of calling on the police to act; but the policemen said that there was no actual mischief done, except breaking a few chairs and benches; therefore, said they, "Let them go on; if anything further takes place, we will interfere." I am sorry to occupy the time of the House; but a charge having been made against me, I feel it due to myself to give it a thorough and distinct denial.

Mr. KEMBLE. — Sir, I was unfortunately prevented by an engagement from attending the meeting; but as it has been stated by the Honourable Member for Lambeth that there was a majority in favour of Mr. Curling and his party, I beg to declare that all whom I have seen, who attended the meeting, concur in saying that the majority was most decidedly in favour of the resolutions proposed by my worthy colleague.

Mr. HAWES then brought up Mr. Curling's petition.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON presented petitions from 6500 inhabitants of Liverpool: — from the Mariners' Church at Liverpool: from the congregations of All Saints Church; and Christ Church; and several other congregations at Liverpool, against the Government plan.

Mr. BRISCOE. — Sir, I wish to ask the Noble Lord whether these petitions are against the Government plan that has been withdrawn, or against the plan which is to be produced this evening?

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON.—They pray the House not to sanction the Government scheme.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I should certainly like to have one or two petitions read, that the House may know against which scheme the petitions really are.

The petition of the Mariners' congregation was then read, and it was against the plan laid before Parliament and agreed to by the Privy Council.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON. — Sir, in answer to my Noble Friend, I beg to say that the signing to one of the petitions was going on up to the last moment the post would allow, and some signatures are even now on the road. I presume, therefore, that such petition is against the present scheme, which had then been published to the whole town; and I can state that one of the petitions, having 808 signatures to it, is specifically against the present scheme, — for a petition from the same parties has been presented against the former scheme.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Sir, with regard to the petition which has just been read, it is as much against one scheme as against the other; the fact is, the plan described in the petition as the plan petitioned against, bears not the slightest resemblance to either of the plans which have been proposed by the Government.

Petitions to lie on the table.

Mr. HOPE (Gloucester). — Sir, I have to complain, that it appears, from a report in the Morning Post, that my colleague

(Mr. Phillpotts), in presenting a petition from Gloucester, the other day, in favour of the Government plan of education, described it as a petition agreed to at a meeting of the Diocesan Society.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Is the Honourable Member going to complain of a newspaper, or of a Member of this House?

Mr. HOPE. — I am going to end with a question.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — If the Honourable Member refers to a former debate, he is out of order.

Mr. HOPE. — That may be strictly true; but I trust I may be allowed to state, in a few words, what actually took place on the occasion alluded to. There was no meeting of the Diocesan Society held. An advertisement appeared, calling a meeting of the Established Church Society; but as the Government plan was, on the day of meeting, understood to have been withdrawn, the persons who called the meeting met, and adjourned, without agreeing to any petition; and, afterwards, others went to the rooms, voted a person into the chair, and agreed to a petition in favour of the very scheme of education which had been abandoned by the Government.

Mr. PHILLPOTTS. — What I have stated was communicated to me by the gentleman who was chairman of the meeting, who is a magistrate of Gloucestershire; he did not state that it was agreed to at the meeting of the Diocesan Society.

THE BUDGET.

Mr. HUME. — Sir, on Monday, it is my intention to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer to fix a day for his motion respecting joint stock banks, and, also, to name the day when the Budget will be brought forward.

EDUCATION PLAN.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Sir, it is my duty to move, "That the Order of the Day for the House resolving itself into a Committee of Supply" be now read.

LORD STANLEY. — Mr. Speaker: — I now rise, in conformity with what I believe to be the desire of the vast majority of the petitioners, who have addressed the House in numbers almost unprecedented, — and in accordance with what I believe to be the opinion of the vast majority of the enlightened people of this country, — not to meet the present proposition of the Government by any doubtful or ambiguous course, — not to avail myself of any parliamentary technicality for the purpose of getting rid of it by any side wind, or for the purpose of incidentally defeating it; — but I come to grapple with the source of the evil, whence that plan, or those plans, which have been in succession introduced, have emanated, which have been brought forward by her Majesty's Government, to establish what they are pleased to call a scheme of national education. I rise for the purpose of objecting to any scheme which gives the direct control, and all but the legislative authority, over the moral and religious education of the people of this country, to any board or committee, or any body of men — call them what you will — of an exclusively political character, necessarily, and of course, fluctuating in its composition, and in the men of whom it is constituted, — but who possess not in their constitution any one fixed or definite principle, or any enduring character; and as to whom, by no possibility or chance can it ever happen that there can be admitted into this board, which is to preside over the moral and religious education of the people of this country, any single member of that class and profession who are, by law, bound to attend to, and who are intrusted with, the spiritual and religious instruction of the people. I might, indeed, have adopted a different course; I might have suffered the House to go into committee, and I might then have objected to the grant of the sum of 30,000*l.*: but I know the importance of such a step; — I know the misrepresentations to which I should have been liable if such a course had been by me pursued; — I know very well the illiberality and the bigotry which would have been charged upon me and my friends near me; — I know the impression which would be promulgated, that we objected to a practical measure, — that we stood in the way of the enlightenment of the people, — and that we refused to permit the Government to provide, out of the public funds, for the moral and religious education of the people. I might have taken another mode, and introduced a motion directly condemnatory of the plan of her Majesty's Government. At one time, I thought that this course might be desirable; but further consideration has induced me to abandon it as too indefinite; and, besides, we have seen, and the Noble Lord has given proof this evening, how easy it is to slip out of the plan of yesterday; and when the plan of yesterday is scouted with the indignant remonstrances and derision of the country, the Noble Lord consoles himself with saying, "True it is that a cry has been raised against our yesterday's plan; but, look, — to-day, we have a fresh plan, and it is impossible that that can have been objected to." No, Sir; so long as this Committee of the Privy Council — irresponsible, unrepressed, and unfettered by Parliament — remains in existence, it will be the fertile source of bringing out one plan after the other, equally objectionable in principle, but each evading the many objections which have been urged with irresistible force against the proceeding; so long will scheme after scheme, and plan after plan, be produced, in violation of every principle which should regulate the distribution of the money of the people. It is like the old story described by Virgil, —

— Primo avulso non deficit alter.

And, if continued, it would be — ——————— Alter

Aureus.

[Loud cheers.]

And I might continue —

Ergo alte vestiga oculis, et rite repertum, Carpe manu.

I take, however, a bolder course; I object to the very source of the plans or of the schemes, or whatever they may be called, which have succeeded each other in such rapid succession, and with such little deliberation. I object to the irresponsible authority vested in her Majesty's Privy Council. I object to the despotic and unfettered control given to them, and from them I appeal to the deliberate judgment, to the constitutional responsibility, and to the legal authority of the British Parliament. If the proceedings of the Privy Council, or if the constitution of the committee, were restricted to any immediate executive purpose, — if it were a mere change of authority formerly vested in the Lords of the Treasury, — if it were a mere transfer from the Lords of the Treasury to the Committee of the Privy Council, of a power of executing some purposes which were definitively laid down by Parliament, or of granting money, upon any known conditions, in favour of any defined plans of education, vouched for by the two societies whose plans are known, — I would not object to the transfer of this executive and ministerial authority from the Lords of the Treasury to the Committee of the Privy Council; and I should have seen little difference between the distribution, by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as a member of the Board of Treasury, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, as a member of the Privy Council. But there are no such restrictions in the measure, — there is no such plan — no such delegation, — there is to be no legislation with the consent of Parliament; but by a resolution of one branch of the Legislature, powers are to be given to the board, which are indefinite, uncontrolled, and irresponsible, — powers, the extent of which you do not know, yourselves, and which the Committee of the Privy Council are to execute with perfect irresponsibility and perfect impunity. The Noble Lord, at the opening of the present Session, said, with respect to the first scheme which he intended to have proposed to Parliament, that he would form a body, or a board, or committee, or by whatever name it might be called, not of persons of one party or the other, — meaning not political doctrines, — but the adherents to the doctrines of the established church, or to opposite doctrines.

[Cries of "No, no!"]

Yes; pardon me. The Noble Lord, having spoken of the National Society, and then speaking of the British and Foreign School Society, went on to say that he knew that, in the last Session, the Honourable Member for Waterford had recommended "the appointment of a central board of education. Now" (he observed), "if a board of education were appointed, composed of persons of different persuasions, in conformity with the plan of educating all religious denominations in the same schools, it must appear, from what he had already stated, that it would not be a board possessing the confidence of the church. He thought it better, therefore, that the Government should form that body, — call it a board, or a committee, or what they would, — not from any one religious body or sect, or from members of various sects, but from the official servants of the Crown, who must always depend upon the confidence of that House, and who must look to them to decide whether or not the system which they recommended was such as should be supported." Here, then, is the statement of the Noble Lord, at the opening of the present Session. From that opinion the Noble Lord will excuse me from dissenting. I think it a most objectionable principle, that a system of such vital importance as the systematic education of the people of this country should depend upon the fluctuations or the changes of the Government, — that it should be mixed up with every political and every party contest, — that it should depend, not upon the merits of the system, or on the equity of its conditions, but that it should not depend upon the confidence of the Parliament of this country, but, upon the confidence which a bare majority of this House might repose in the Government of the day. I object to giving funds for such a purpose, to be placed in the hands of the Government, with irresponsible power, to further their own political objects, and for the support of their own political friends. I would ask the Honourable Gentlemen opposite, and I would ask those who dissent from the doctrines of the established church, whether they would consent to repose the instruction of the people, and to trust, in this matter, to a Government composed of persons who held the conscientious opinion that the national church ought to be the vehicle by which the education of the people, out of the national funds, ought to be administered? I ask whether they would not view with the greatest possible jealousy the unrestrained use of these funds by any party in Parliament, to further views of their own? And if there be danger in thus intrusting the funds for the education of the people to any Government, without defining the principles on which those funds are to be administered, I would ask, whether it would not be doubly dangerous if a case should arise in which the Government of the day should be so weak as to be struggling for political existence, and as to be anxious to grasp at support from any half dozen of Members, from any quarter, and on any conditions; when, if there should be a violation of the condition imposed by Parliament, — when, if they should apply the greater portion of the funds to favouring their own political and parliamentary supporters in the country, — the only check which could be held over the Government would be the not very formidable apprehension of the censure of a majority of this House, if they should use the power vested in them in furtherance of a political party, — that party being composed of the majority of the House themselves?

But, Sir, the Noble Lord has said that he desired the appointment of a board which should have the confidence of this House, and he made it to depend upon this House whether or not the system introduced by the board should be permanent. Now, I maintain that we ought not to introduce the elements of constant fluctuation and change into these matters, and that such a system would be one on which the nation could not place the slightest reliance. And when I speak of confidence, I beg to direct the attention of the Noble Lord to the opinions of a body of which the Noble Lord entertains a high opinion, and of which I, myself, wish to speak with every possible respect, — I mean the British and Foreign School Society. They consider that, in the constitution of a board, it is essential that we should appoint such a one as should enjoy the confidence of the various religious congregations in the country. The society declare that they believe that the degree of confidence which the Government enjoy will mainly depend upon the effects of the system of education which shall be adopted. I ask the Noble Lord what part of the scheme, or what part of the plan, to be proposed by the Board, he flatters himself will enjoy the public confidence? The Noble Lord will not contend that he enjoys the confidence of the established church? He will admit, at all events, that the established church is not the least important of the religious denominations of this country? and he will not deny that the vast majority of the laity of that church, and almost the incalculable majority of the clergy of that church, as well as of the prelates, with hardly an exception, — if, indeed, there be one, — have expressed, one and all, not their confidence, but their entire and absolute dissent from the principles embodied in the formation of the committee? Where is it, then, that he would turn next for his confidence among the religious denominations? I ask him, which, — next to the established church, — which is the most important, which is the most influential, which is the most zealous and the most active in the cause of education, of all those sects into which the other Protestant portion of the community is divided? The Noble Lord will answer me, or the great body of the country will answer me, — the Wesleyan Methodists. They will tell me that, from the days of John Wesley to the present time, that sect has been distinguished by a religious zeal which has afforded — I will not say a contrast, but — an honourable object of emulation to the members of the established church itself: they will tell me that that sect which differs the least widely from the established church, which in matters of doctrine hardly differs at all, which has put itself prominently forward, on all occasions, as the friend of education, properly so called, combined with religious instruction — they will tell me, and the petitions which have been showered on the table of this House will tell me, and tell the House, in terms not to be mistaken — that, among them, but one universal feeling of absolute distaste to, and detestation for, the scheme now provided, exists!

Let the Noble Lord, then, say which of the other religious denominations of the country have come forward to support the scheme which the Government proposes? The most that he could argue would be founded upon so much confidence and assent as are exhibited by their expressive silence; while, from the greater proportion of the other dissenting bodies, petitions have been brought forward, of course widely differing from the views of the established church and of the Wesleyan Methodists, but differing not less widely from the plan of the Government; and many have been presented from the other side of the House, praying that, unless certain conditions be complied with (which, however, I trust, will never be complied with), no further grant may be made. Therefore, while the Baptists, and Socinians, and other separatists tell him that the success of his board depends on his having the combined approbation of all religious denominations in this country, I can find no one sect which has signified its assent to this scheme, — a scheme which, on the other hand, is opposed by the established church as one man, and by the next most active and important body in the country, — the Wesleyan Methodists, — among whom exists no difference of opinion as to making one common cause with the established church.

But, Sir, if I object to the constitution of this committee, as a body, to regulate and control the education of this country, on the ground that it is fluctuating in its character and political in its object, and also that it does not even carry with it the recommendation of its having the support and confidence of any one great body of the various denominations of this country; yet I object to it still more strongly and decidedly as a churchman, because I find that the constitution of it is such as to give the religious education of the people to a body exclusively named, and unconnected with the Church of England. It is a new proposition, — and it is highly improper that such a question should be left to the judgment of such men as would be employed, — when such a principle is involved as the question of what is meant by education? Those who limit it to the mere enlargement of the intellect, or the securing to the scholar a certain degree of worldly knowledge and temporary information, — who endeavour to fit the population of this country for the improvement of their own condition here, without reference to religious feelings or motives, apart from spiritual knowledge, — I perfectly understand; and I concur with them, that with such a system the clergy have nothing to do, and that such a system would be most fitly superintended by a body of laymen: but, Sir, give me leave to say, that I believe that that is not the light in which education is looked upon by the great body of the people of this country, or in which it has been viewed from the earliest ages; for education has been regarded in connection with religion, by the constitution and the laws of the land. It is not a thing apart from religion — it is not a thing apart from the church — it is a business which the constitution and the laws of this country consider as the peculiar province of the clergy of this country; and which, being a spiritual matter, belongs to the spiritual superintendents of the people. In very early times — in times before the Reformation — the education of the people was wholly and entirely in the hands of the clergy; it was almost, if not exclusively, in the hands of the Catholic clergy. But we are not now contending whether it should be in the hands of the clergy, or not? but that it is not now considered, nor ever has been, by the law of the land, or by the people, as a thing to be dealt with apart from spiritual superintendence, and from religious instruction. I find it laid down by the Chief Justice, in a case so early as the reign of Henry IV., in the French of that day, that "La doctrine et information des enfans est chose spirituelle," and as such it has remained, and been considered, from that time to the present; and it is considered in common law, that matters peculiarly of education belong to the ecclesiastical courts, and the courts have decided it to be a matter of ecclesiastical cognizance, and have, therefore, refused to interfere with such subjects. I believe that that is a doctrine as old as the history of this country, and exists even down to the present time. I do not require to be told, as the Noble Lord has told the House, that by the Act of Toleration, and various other statutes, Dissenters are excepted from various provisions to which they were before liable. That is not the question, however, now. But I contend that education, whether of persons connected with the church or with Dissenters, is not a thing apart from religion; that it is a thing necessarily connected with it — necessarily dependent on it, — and on which religious doctrine and religious faith must, in a great degree, be grounded. Religion, then, is not a thing apart from education, but is interwoven with its whole system, and is a principle which controls and regulates the whole mind and happiness of the people.

The Noble Lord, the other day, at the commencement of the Session, on introducing his plan, after speaking of the Act of Toleration, and of the perfect freedom of education among all classes of society, — which no one, now, would think of disputing, but which we are, nevertheless, charged with disputing — although such a charge is utterly without foundation, — thought it necessary to tell the House that "he conceived the general recognised doctrine of the state to be, that education was free to all persons, whether members of the church or any other religious denomination." To be sure it is; but let us have it free to the church also, and let us not have the government of the country interfering to take away the education of the children of the church out of its hands. Perhaps some Honourable Gentlemen may sneer at what I humbly conceive to be the legal position of the question; but I think that they may be inclined to listen to the very high authority on this subject, to which I am about to refer, and who says, in terms so clear and comprehensive, how far education is connected with religion, and how far it should, consequently, be connected with the church. In giving judgment in a case in which reference was made to the courts of ecclesiastical jurisdiction, Lord Chief Justice Holt laid down this doctrine: —"Without doubt, schoolmasters are, in a great measure, intrusted with the instruction of youth in principles, and therefore it is necessary they should be of sound doctrine; and in order thereto, subject to the regulation of the ordinary." I do not mean to go farther than this, now; I do not desire to interfere beyond this.

An HONOURABLE MEMBER on the Ministerial side of the House. — That is far enough.

LORD STANLEY. — An Honourable Member says "That is far enough;" but I say that, — whether in that Honourable Gentleman's estimation it is so, or is a great deal too far, — from the earliest times, such has certainly been the law, and the practice of the kingdom, sanctioned by the judges and by the authorities of the highest importance, and most intimately connected with the feelings and affections and convictions of the people of England. Now, Sir, I know it is very easy to say, "Well, but we admit all this; that education must involve religious instruction — must be based on religious principles; we admit (and so said the Noble Lord, himself) that education is not a thing separate and apart from religion, and that it is necessary, in any scheme which may be adopted, to give it to the youth whom we instruct, and to take care that they receive instruction on those points of faith and doctrine which are essential to secure the foundation of principles of moral and religious conduct." This is a very serious question; it is a question which is hardly necessary to treat of or argue in any popular assembly; and yet it so mainly depends on its discussion, — I mean, how far the church is justified in assenting to the principle proposed by the Government, for the combination of all classes in one common scheme, and for receiving them all into one common institution, — that it is necessary to ask the House whether or not we can abandon those great points of doctrine and faith on which the various sects of the community differ, — and yet which are so interwoven with the doctrines of Christianity, and so important to Christian motives, that they cannot be overlooked by the church, blinked by the people, or complimented away, — for the purpose of the adoption of this new plan? It would involve the questions of faith, of the efficacy of the baptism of infants, and of the blessed benefits derived from the Holy Eucharist; and yet we must consent that these should all be put aside as matters not to be treated of in public, and in ignorance of which, all classes, whether Baptists, or Quakers, Socinians, or Roman Catholics, should be brought up. If these were — any of them — points of abstract principle, or were mere dogmas, the solution of which in one way or other was of no great importance, I should say, out of Christian charity, and for the purpose of combining all that could be united, and of laying aside all that was not important or essential, and whatever was food for speculation, that the principles, so far, might be adopted; but when I see that they are not such dogmata, but the main springs of Christian doctrines, — and when I believe that they must form a most material point in religious instruction, and should be thoroughly inculcated in the hearts of children, — I cannot agree to any fanciful scheme of conciliation, or treat as matter of minor importance, or of indifference, or as things to be put aside, those principles which I hold to be among the fundamental doctrines of Christianity.

Sir, when we are charged by Honourable Members on the other side of the House with claiming, on the part of the church, that it should have the exclusive right to educate, I ask the House and the Noble Lord, — (and I shall ask no more, for the purpose of proving the utter groundlessness of the charge,) — what objection there is to such a scheme, when I point to the almost unanimous assent of this House — the almost unanimous assent of the country, and to the entire approbation of the great body of the community — which were exhibited to the system of education that, from 1834 to the present time, has been carried on under the auspices of the Government? Is that a scheme which vested in the clergy of the established church the absolute control of the education of the people? Is that a scheme which interferes with the free right of all denominations to educate their own people — nay, to object to have them educated by the assistance and at the expense of the state? Why, Sir, it is well known that, according to that plan, the funds of the country have been bestowed, not upon the Church of England alone, or on the members of the Church of England alone, but professedly and intentionally on two societies, one of which is deemed the representative of the Church of England, while the other appears to consist of those who dissent from that church. Has there been the slightest suggestion that the funds granted have been misapplied? or has there been a question whether the conditions laid down by Parliament have not been followed? or has there been even the slightest partiality exhibited in the mode in which the funds have been distributed? Certain conditions were imposed in 1834; and I will take the liberty of referring the House to the scheme as proposed in the first instance, by Lord Althorp, — and as it has obtained, since then, the almost universal concurrence of the country; and then I shall point out to the House in how many and in how important points the scheme of the Government, now proposed, departs from the fundamental doctrines laid down by Lord Althorp, and also from the despatches of the Government, delivered in March last. Lord Althorp said, —

"I am well aware that the circumstance of the Government advancing money, and assisting an object of this kind, has a tendency to check private charity; and that such interference is, in general, mischievous rather than advantageous. But there is one thing in which private subscriptions are frequently deficient, and that is in first setting a school on foot; and we have thought that it would not be an improper expenditure of the public money to grant the sum of 20,000*l.*, to be applied, in the present year, to assist in building school-houses. This money will be placed at the disposal of the Treasury; but it is not the intention of the Treasury, in appropriating it, to take the recommendation of the two societies established in this country, — the National and the British or Lancasterian Society.

Sir, I entirely concur in that doctrine of the Noble Lord. I know that his doctrine has been, upon every subject, that, if the Government funds were given, local contributions were checked: but the right principle is, that they should not be checked, but should be extended as far as possible; and the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer agreed to and acted upon that doctrine. "It is intended (said he), first, that no advance shall be made out of this grant towards the building of any school-house, unless a subscription to a certain amount be first made; and, secondly, which is most important, it is intended that even if the required amount be raised by subscription, no advance shall be made for the purpose of erecting a school-house in any place, unless the Treasury shall be satisfied that there are funds sufficient to keep the school in action after the house has been built." The Government acted upon that principle in the year 1834, and during the subsequent years to the present time; and the applications, since, have become greater in every succeeding year, until at length they have been obliged to complain of their inability to meet the wishes of all parties.

I am, perhaps, wearying the House in entering into these details; but it is important to inquire what was the effect of the system in the first year after it was undertaken in this country; because, if we are going to deviate from a scheme against which no voice has been raised, for the purpose of entering upon a plan against which a universal and indignant outcry has been excited, it is right that some satisfactory reason should be given to the public, showing the necessity for pursuing some new course. The object of this scheme is to promote and increase the amount of education given throughout the country: the extent of education now afforded has been unanimously declared to be lamentably deficient; and, indeed, it has been lamentably deficient up to the present time. Nobody denies this fact; no persons are more sensible of it than are the members of the established church; and to a system of education founded on fair, impartial, and equitable principles, — a system not interfering with the principles and doctrines of the church, but affording every latitude to the education of the Dissenters, — I tell the Noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) and those who surround him, that from no portion of the community will it more readily receive support than from these Gentlemen who now sit opposite to them. If the Noble Lord doubts it, I wish he would try the experiment. If the Noble Lord will persist in, instead of departing from, the present system, — a system which has been carried on, now, for four years, successfully, and without complaint, — and will propose to increase the amount of the public grant in furtherance of this system, probably all the opposition the Noble Lord will meet with will be, not from this, but from the Noble Lord's own side of the House. In the year 1834, the Treasury minute, presented to Parliament on the 7th of March, states: —

There exists throughout Great Britain the utmost anxiety that the funds provided by Parliament for the purposes of education should be made generally useful; and the private charity and liberality, so far from being checked, have been greatly stimulated and encouraged by reason of the public assistance afforded to the principle laid down in their minute of the 30th of August, 1833. The applications now before my Lords, and recommended to their favourable consideration, amount to a sum of 31,016*l.*, whereas the sum at their disposal does not exceed 11,719*l.* Applications have been received from 236 new schools, calculated for 55,168 scholars, and local and charitable funds were tendered to the amount of 66,492*l.*

Is there, then, any indication in 1834 that the plan laid down by Lord Althorp had failed? Is there any question or complaint raised, that the funds voted by Parliament towards increasing the amount of education throughout the country have been unduly applied? or that those funds have passed unduly into the hands of one portion of the community, at the expense of the other? I believe that, in the first year, the distribution of the 30,000*l.* voted was made up in an equitable ratio between the two societies — the National School Society and the British and Foreign School Society, — and upon the equitable ratio founded on the first of all the principles of the scheme — namely, that the members of each should have the required amount, founded on the proportion of the local contributions. And did this state of things cease with the year 1834? Not at all. I hold in my hand Returns for the years 1834, 1835, 1836, and 1837. The Return for 1838 was moved for by the Honourable Member for Waterford, (Mr. Wyse), in a different form from the preceding Returns, and does not show the amount of local contributions, or that which became available for the purpose of education. But from the other Returns it appears that, in the year 1834, the amount granted was 20,484*l.*, in aid of 48,111*l.* local contributions; in 1835, a grant of 19,368*l.*, in aid of 59,619*l.*; in 1836, a grant of 21,669*l.*, in aid of 71,731*l.*; — (the proportions all this time of the local contributions becoming larger as the most stringent rules were laid down by the Treasury, in consequence of the funds at their disposal being so limited); — and in 1837, a grant of 17,277*l.* was given in aid of 54,486*l.*, the amount of local contributions and private beneficence of that year. During the four years to which I have referred, this was the result of "the wretched, miserable contribution" of 78,798*l.* made by Parliament: it produced from the private funds of individuals a sum of 165,149*l.* towards the building and erection of schools; it produced from the same sources 233,947*l.* for the permanent and continued education of 153,600 more scholars than were previously in a course of education in England; it not only drew forth other great exertions for the building of schools, but the expense of the whole 153,600 children, and the continued support of the schools, were charged — not on the public funds, but — on the private munificence and benevolence of individuals. Now, I ask the Noble Lord, and I ask the House, with regard to the extent of education, the amount of local interest excited, and of private beneficence thus displayed, what grounds exist for finding fault with or abandoning the system of the year 1834, which has worked prosperously up to the present time? I should be sorry to suppose it possible that such a motive can actuate her Majesty's Government, as that they feel it expedient to withdraw from the system, because, under it, year after year, in consequence of the exertions of the church, the whole amount of the Government aid has been invested in the education of the children in the communion of the church. I desire freedom of education; but I cannot consider it matter of indifference either to the Government or to the country, — still less that it can be an objection to the system, — that, under it, without partiality or undue interference, a larger proportion of the population than heretofore has been brought up, not in ignorance, infidelity, and perhaps vice, but gathered to that church which has been, which is, and which I trust will long continue the national establishment of the country. I am confident that the Noble Lord and her Majesty's Government will disclaim any such motive, and will adopt other and bolder grounds for the change. I conclude it will be argued, that it is not the mere building of schools — it is not the mere brick-and-mortar foundations — it is not the extent or quantity of the education afforded by these societies, — it is not these matters which are of essential importance to the country; but that, not only is the quantity of education given, deficient, but that the quality of the education afforded both by the National and British and Foreign School Societies is far below what it ought to be, and that the qualification of their teachers is also below what it ought to be, when the state of civilisation and refinement to which this country has now arrived is taken into consideration.

If this be the ground of objection, I am ready to meet the Noble Lord upon it. I maintain that none have put themselves so prominently forward in endeavouring to improve the qualifications of those masters — none have been so anxious for the foundation and maintenance of normal schools for training teachers — none have taken so early and so active a lead in seeking to attain all those objects, as have the members of the established churches of England and of Scotland; and I will prove that, if there has been delay in some matters, if no normal or model schools have been founded in either country, the blame rests, not with those societies which have been intrusted by Parliament with public funds, but the blame rests with the Government, themselves, who have delayed that assistance which those societies required. The first grant for model or normal schools was taken in the year 1835; it was voted without observation at a late period of the Session, — but having once been so taken, it has not been questioned from that time down to the present; and it is with great surprise that, looking from the year 1835 down to the present time, I could find no trace of the manner in which that sum of 10,000*l.*, with which the Government were intrusted in 1835, has been applied. I accordingly called for the correspondence which took place on the subject; and the paper I now hold in my hand contains the result of that correspondence. In the first place it states that no part of the 10,000*l.*, voted in 1835, has been yet expended. Here, then, is the delay — here, then, is the fault. Whose is it? Is it the fault of the National Society, of the British and Foreign School Society, of the members of the established churches of England and Scotland, or of her Majesty's Government? I will proceed to show with whom the delay has arisen, and to whom the fault is to be attributed. In March, 1838, the Glasgow Educational Society, which has taken a most active and efficient part in the establishment of infant and model schools, and also of normal schools, — and from whose regulations the Noble Lord opposite borrowed much of that which was valuable in the details of the scheme he has abandoned, — reminded the Government that "a deputation from the society had waited on the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer, about two years ago, to ascertain whether he would recommend a grant of 3000*l.* for those purposes, provided a similar sum were raised by private contributions. The proposal was well received by him; but, as he was not prepared to give a decided answer, no further steps were then taken, and no formal application was then made to their Lordships." Subsequently, however, a grant of 1000*l.* was applied for by the society, and (it is said) "this request was ultimately complied with, as intimated by your Lordships to the Rev. Dr. Black and the Rev. Peter Napier, on certain conditions, with which the society are ready to comply, but they delay applying for the money until they shall have laid before your Lordships all their wants." The society then state that they have considerably extended their original plans; that they have gone to a very large outlay, and are anxious still further to extend their useful operations. They further state, "that the Glasgow normal seminary is connected with the Church of Scotland in the same way as the Scottish parochial schools, — being intended chiefly to train masters for those schools; but all, of every denomination, are admitted to its benefits as students upon the same terms, — namely, the payment of a small fee in aid of the funds." They then solicited a grant of 5000*l.*, to enable the society to complete the institution; and they state their readiness to exhibit vouchers of the actual expenditure in such form as the Lords of the Treasury might require. This application was made in the month of March, 1838; and the paper from which I quote, purports to be the correspondence which took place on the subject. It contains one side of the correspondence, — namely, the application; but if there have been any answer sent, it does not appear in his Return. Some answer may have been sent, but ——

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — No answer was sent.

LORD STANLEY.—Then no answer has, it appears, been sent; and so, with regard to the normal school at Glasgow, and to the exertions of the people of Glasgow, my Scotch friends will be glad to hear that there can be no charge of lukewarmness against them for not endeavouring to forward this important branch of national education. I now come to the letter (contained in this Return) of the Secretary to the Treasury, written by direction of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in which he calls the attention of the National School Society and of the British and Foreign School Society to the plan proposed by her Majesty's Government, and invites the cordial co-operation of those societies to carry it into effect. And what was this plan? In the first place, the letter invites the National and British Societies "to direct an inspection to be made for the purpose of the several schools which they have recommended to the board, and for the erection of which grants have been appropriated out of the parliamentary votes;" and, secondly, the letter adds —

My Lords are of opinion that the erection of model schools for the instruction of teachers, by both the National and British and Foreign School Societies, would greatly tend to add to the efficiency of their several establishments, and that they should be called upon, if the respective committees of those societies concur in that opinion, to take steps for such purpose; it appearing to my Lords, that public aid might be advantageously directed towards this object, provided a suitable plan for carrying those intentions into effect were submitted to the board and approved of, and provided that the principle of private contribution already laid down and carried into effect by previous minutes of their Lordships, were strictly adhered to.

The letter also contains fourteen questions, to be answered by both these societies, and, as I have already stated, is dated the 7th of July, 1838. Was there any delay on the part of these societies, on the receipt of that letter? None; for on the 21st of July the following answer was sent by the National School Society. It is dated "Central School, Westminster, July 21. 1838:"—

I have laid your letter of the 7th instant before the committee of the National Society; and, with reference to the subject of model schools, I am directed to state in reply, that the committee are very desirous to profit by public aid in regard to these institutions, and will gladly avail themselves of any assistance which the Lords of the Treasury may offer for the purpose of promoting and assisting local exertions and contributions towards the maintenance, extension, and effectual improvement of the model schools which already exist in the metropolis, and in various parts of the kingdom; and in order to accomplish these objects, the board is particularly impressed with the importance of making such arrangements as will enable the teachers to remain for a longer period of time in training, and afford encouragement to a superior class of persons to offer themselves for the service of educating the working classes. Your letter invites the committee to call upon their Lordships for assistance in the undertaking referred to. With reference to this, and for the purpose of manifesting the earnestness of the committee on the subject, I am directed to add, that the desire of the board was expressed according to the foregoing terms in July, 1835, in answer to an inquiry relative thereto made by the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that a direct official communication, embodying an expression of the same sentiments, was again addressed to the Chancellor of the Exchequer in the early part of the next year (1836), in reply to which it was stated, "that the subject of model schools was at present before him, and would receive his best attention."

So that in 1838, at least, the Chancellor of the Exchequer gave "his best attention" to the subject of model schools, and asked the co-operation of these societies. The letter went on to state, they had already answered the fourteen questions bearing on the subject, and contained in the letter of the 7th of July, and it then proceeded to inquire whether it was intended to limit the grant to the same proportion of contributions as formerly,— namely, to l. sterling for every two children, according to the number of scholars accommodated in the schools for practice? and it was further asked, —

First, whether the National Society may expect one half of the estimated cost of the buildings indispensably required for a model school? or what proportion of the cost it may be their Lordships' purpose to allow? and, secondly, whether they may be favoured with the assistance of their Lordships in providing them with a site at Westminster, or within a reasonable distance of their present central school? by which arrangement a material diminution of the expense of the proposed undertaking would be effected.

To this communication the society received no reply until the 4th of September, 1838, when the following satisfactory answer reached them: —

With reference to your secretary's letter of the 21st of July last, in answer to the letter from this board (the Treasury) of the 7th of the same month, on the subject of model schools, I am commanded by the Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury to inform you, that, until they have before them the general views of the society in respect to the scale of the proposed model school, and the estimated expense, my Lords are unable to give precise replies to your inquiries further than by stating, that, whilst they still adhere to the principles of private contributions in aid of this important object, my Lords do not mean to limit their aid by the proportions fixed in reference to ordinary schools.

The House will perceive that no reply was given to the inquiry with regard to a site; and on the 20th of September the committee of the Central Society again wrote, requesting an answer, in that respect, to their letter of the 21st of July. On the 5th of October they received this answer:—

With reference to that part of your letter of the 20th ult., requesting an answer to the inquiry in your letter of the 31st of July last, relative to the providing of a site for a model school within a moderate distance of the present central school, I am commanded by the Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury to request that you will furnish their Lordships with some explanation of the application referred to.

Upon this, did the Central Society lose any time? On the contrary, they felt themselves called on by that document to proceed to minute investigations as to the details of the plan, and the estimated expense, with a view, generally, to furnish the fullest information upon which the Government could give an immediate answer, "ay or no," whether they would adhere to the proposition; and accordingly, on the 13th of February last, the Government was furnished with detailed plans and estimates by the committee of the Central Society. And what was the result? Why, that on the 18th of March following, they received this very satisfactory answer:—

In answer to your letter of the 9th instant——

(for, having received no reply, the committee had written again on that day)

—In answer to your letter of the 9th instant, calling the attention of this board to your application of the 13th ultimo, for a grant in aid of establishing a large training institution in connection with the central school, I am commanded by the Lords Commissioners of her Majesty's Treasury to acquaint you, that they have forwarded your application for the consideration of the Committee of the Lords of the Privy Council for Education.

Now, it is a little singular that the application made on the part of the National Society connected with Liverpool was in the same condition, and met with a similar fate; for they also, on the 2d of March, received information that their application had been sent to the Committee of the Privy Council. That Committee of the Privy Council, to which these references were made on the 2d, the 9th, and the 18th of March, had (as the House has been informed) no legal existence whatever until the 10th of April last, when it was constituted by an Order in Council. Consequently, for the mere purpose of avoiding giving a direct answer to a direct application, made in pursuance of an application on the part of the Government themselves——

—Well, if not for the purpose, at all events such was the effect of the course pursued. The Government transmitted that application to a board which, at the time, was not in existence. What was the consequence? Why, that on the very day after the constitution of that board,—on the 11th of April,—the board issued a minute, intended to be the basis of all future proceedings, which directly, and in terms, negatived the possibility of the Government assenting to this application, which was, in fact, the very same the Government had themselves invited in the month of July previously. I have quoted these documents at some length, and I fear to the inconvenience of the House; but I have done so for the purpose of appealing to the judgment of the House and to the country, to determine whether, on this point of improving the quality as well as the quantity of the education to be given through the agency of these societies, there has been any delay on the part of those who desired that education to be on a religious basis? or whether, on the other hand, there have not been great and unnecessary delay and inconsistency on the part of her Majesty's Government, who, in July, 1838, put forth proposals for the disposal of a grant obtained in 1835, and afterwards, in April, 1839, informed the applicants that they could not carry out the very proposition which they had made in the July of the previous year?

Having now, at such length, explained my objections, on principle, to the constitution of the board, and to the unrestricted and irresponsible power proposed to be given to them,—of making, at their sole will and pleasure, most important, and perpetual changes—(as they may be)—in the whole system of moral and religious education, under which the youth of this country are to be trained; and protesting, as I do, and always will do, against giving to any Government or Administration powers so extensive and arbitrary as those claimed by her Majesty's present advisers; I will now turn to the consideration of the spirit of the two plans put forward by her Majesty's Government, under the authority of the Committee of the Privy Council. I ask whether, even if the principle were not dangerous, and the powers were not unconstitutional and arbitrary, the scheme is so innocent, its rules so unobjectionable, clear, definite, and incapable of misconstruction, as to reconcile the people of this country to its being conducted and carried on under the irresponsible authority of that board? It was laid down, in the first instance, that the grants were to be made (and the arrangement was entirely satisfactory to the country) upon the responsibility of the two societies, whose system of education is known, and which are composed, in one case, of clergymen of the Church of England,— at least, such clergymen constitute the great majority of its members, and, ex officio, all the heads of the Church of England are members, — composed, in short, of individuals in whom the members of the Church of England repose implicit confidence, and for whom the people at large, whether Dissenters or Churchmen, cannot but entertain the highest respect; — and in the other case including a great number of the best instructed and most pious of the dissenting body; while both comprise within their limits a very large amount of clerical superintendence and clerical security for the communication of religious instruction according to the forms of the established church, or of the different dissenting congregations. The great complaint is, that their funds are insufficient, and the demands upon them are so extensive that it is impossible, within reasonable limits, to meet them. What was the first step which it was proposed to take, in order to meet the pressure of the case? That to the National Society, and to the British and Foreign Society, having from the one a demand for 25,000*l.*, and from the other what I admit to have been no great encouragement, — (for they declared it inexpedient to expend money upon model schools, except on conditions to which the Government could not accede,) — not a minimum but a maximum should be given of 2500*l.* for the cost of normal schools — 2500*l.*, and no more. The next point, and a most important one it is, relates to the appointment of the school inspectors. Let the House observe how carefully these new powers of control were introduced by her Majesty's Government into the last plan but one which they submitted to the consideration of the House.

It would be very difficult to contend against the principle that, where public aid is administered, the public have a right to satisfy themselves, by their own inspection, and examination, that that public aid has been judiciously applied. This is a principle against which I, for one, will never attempt to contend; and therefore I freely admit the doctrine which has been laid down, that, as aid is to be given by the Lords of the Treasury to certain schools, to be conducted under the auspices of certain recognised societies, they have a right first to satisfy themselves that such aid is properly applied; and, next, that those societies shall regularly report to them as to the state and progress of the schools which are to be built by a grant of public money, and are to be supported afterwards by voluntary contributions. But the Government do not propose to limit their grants to the purpose of erecting the schools, but, in certain particular cases, think it expedient to aid in supporting the schools; to give to their inspectors, — of whom there were at first to be but two, — to their secretary, and to their staff, the power to communicate "useful hints," not only to public but to private schools throughout the different parts of the country, and to apportion gratuities to such of the teachers as shall adopt those improvements which may have been suggested by Government. I may, perhaps, entertain an unjust suspicion——

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Hear, hear!

LORD STANLEY. — I shall be happy to become assured that my suspicions are unjust; but when a plan is proposed one day, and half abandoned on the next;—and when it is proposed to concede an authority founded upon mere Treasury minutes, and not upon Acts of Parliament;—it is the duty of this House to look with suspicion upon the progress of such transactions, and to take care not to permit the existence of any loop-hole or dangerous ambiguity, where there is a question of distributing the public money. The provision to which I here object is, that the Committee of the Privy Council shall have the power of "granting gratuities to such teachers as may appear to deserve encouragement." How can they ascertain whether they are deserving of encouragement, if they are not first to examine whether the schools themselves are in conformity with the plan of the committee? The inspector is to have the power conceded to him of visiting these schools, and of inquiry as to the introduction of all the improvements which he may suggest in the art of teaching; — and is this not to meddle with the internal regulations of the schools? When gratuities are thus to be distributed, merely on the report of their inspectors, I contend that I am not doing great injustice to the Government plan, in saying that it is a most artful mode of intermeddling with the management of private schools. On the 11th of April it was determined that it was not expedient to expend, in grants for building schools, more, in any one year, than 10,000*l.* This determination was greatly modified; for, in a month after, it was decided that from 20,000*l.* to 30,000*l.* might be so expended. It was resolved, in the first place, that —

The committee recommend that the sum of 10,000*l.*, granted by Parliament in 1835 for the erection of normal or model schools, be given in equal proportion to the National Society and the British and Foreign School Society. That the remainder of the subsequent grants for 1837 and 1833 yet unappropriated, and any grant that may be voted in the present year, be chiefly applied in aid of subscriptions for building, and in particular cases for the support of schools connected with those societies; but that the rule hitherto adopted of making a grant to those places where the largest proportion is subscribed be not invariably adhered to, should application be made from very poor and populous districts, where subscriptions to a sufficient amount cannot be obtained.

That is to say, they assume the unlimited right of judging for themselves, and of not being accountable to any one. If the aid is to be given without reference to their own rule, — if the amount of aid is to be diminished or increased in proportion to the amount subscribed from private sources, — what a temptation is afforded to the schools to simulate poverty — to affect not to be in that flourishing condition in which, perhaps, the liberality of the public may have placed them; and this will tend to paralyse local exertion, by inducing the expectation of assistance upon the part of the Government. But the last passage in the minute is the most extraordinary portion of the whole. It runs thus: —

The committee recommend that no further grant be made, now or hereafter, for the support of normal schools, or of any other schools, unless the right of inspection be retained, in order to secure a conformity to the regulations and discipline established in the several schools, with such improvements as may from time to time be suggested by the committee.

[Cheers from the Ministerial benches.]

Honourable Gentlemen cheer. This may be all exceedingly right for those who place unlimited confidence in the discretion of the committee. But for those who entertain no such confidence, — for the country, that is, at large, — I think there is no great security as to the solidity of a plan which, after we have granted them 30,000*l.*, may afterwards be modified in accordance with the experience of four individuals. I will not now enter into the merits of that scheme, or waste the time of the House by arguing on the fundamental defects of the plan, which, from one end of the country to the other, has produced an unqualified declaration from every religious body, that such a scheme is utterly unsatisfactory for the inculcation of religious principles. I will leave to others the task of pointing out the impossibility for members of the established church, the members of the great body of Wesleyan Methodists, and of the other great religious bodies in the kingdom, to acquiesce in a scheme which proposes that the religious instruction of the people shall be conveyed through a body of teachers to be educated for the purpose, and allowed to exercise those functions as soon as they shall have been declared qualified to instruct, without reference to the religious creed of the pupil, or the religious qualifications of the teacher; and that this system of tuition shall be carried on under the direction of the Committee of the Privy Council. Only conceive such a body to conduct the details of the religious education of the country! Only think of such a task devolving on four Lords of her Majesty's Privy Council! But we are also to have a rector appointed, who is to have the control of the religious instruction of all the pupils, without exception.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — No!

LORD STANLEY. — The Noble Lord says, "No!" and perhaps he can explain away the text of this minute of the Privy Council. The Noble Lord promised, ten days since, to put forth some explanatory documents, — but the documents with which he now comes forward, afford no explanation at all. This is nothing more than a nominal and sham abandonment of, with power to return to, the original scheme. The minute in question directs that "a portion of every day shall be devoted to the reading of the Scriptures in the school, under the general direction of the committee and superintendence of the rector." The Scriptures, then, are to be read as a portion of the "general education," under the superintendence of the rector, as specified in the minutes. Protestants of all denominations, Roman Catholics and Socinians, are all to read the Scriptures, and each in his own version. Really, this passage does require an explanatory statement. But the whole scheme has excited — and, unless Parliament interpose, will still continue to excite — general suspicion throughout the country; and more especially that part of the plan which announces, that under the direction of the same individual shall be read the Roman Catholic version, the authorised version, and, as a matter of course, the Socinian version of the Sacred Scriptures. All is to be under the superintendence of the same individual; and what, I will ask, is to be the religion of this individual? Is he to be a man of all religions? or, is he to be a man of no religion? Here is the mischief of jumbling together plans which are perfectly applicable to one system, but perfectly inapplicable to another. You have borrowed your idea of a rector and a general director of studies — with a view to qualify the respective teachers — from the Glasgow normal school, in which the duties of a rector are plain and simple, because the whole arrangements are carried on under the sanction of the established church of Scotland, — of which church the rector himself is a member. But the Noble Lord has said, in answer to various petitions condemnatory of this monstrous scheme of the 11th of April, — "This is not our scheme, now. We have quite a new plan, at present; and how do you know that they have not petitioned solely against our old scheme, and are quite satisfied with our new one?" In so far I believe that the petitioners, as a body, have strictly instructed their representatives to announce that their objection is against the principle; and that the new scheme is, therefore, as objectionable as the old plan. Some of the petitioners — and I am disposed to concur with them — declare the new scheme to be still more objectionable than the former, because more ambiguous. The whole tone and temper of these parties are directed, not against little trifling details of the scheme, but against the pervading spirit and principle which actuated her Majesty's Privy Council in bringing forward the scheme of the 11th of April. But the Noble Lord says that they have abandoned that scheme. Have they? I do not believe that it is abandoned. It is convenient to abandon the defence of it. It is convenient to bow to the storm, and let it pass over their heads, and retain that degree of elasticity which will enable them, when the storm is passed, to rise again and resume their former position. Abandoned! Very far from it; for, in the last edition, the passage still remains which decrees that the funds shall not be merely supplied to the National Society and the British and Foreign School Society, but that, in particular cases, the Lords of the Treasury may give a portion of their funds, not only for the erection but for the support of the schools connected with those societies; and it is distinctly laid down that no assistance shall be given to any school, normal or otherwise, unless the direction of it be retained, in order to see whether or not it conforms to the regulations of the several schools, with such improvements as may, from time to time, suggest themselves. If this scheme meets with the sanction of Parliament, you will be putting the whole education of the country into the hands of a Committee of the Privy Council, — delivering it over, bound hand and foot, into the absolute direction of four Lords of the Treasury, and the secretary and inspectors whom they may choose to appoint, to carry into effect certain regulations which they may, hereafter, think fit to lay down, but of which Parliament is to have no cognizance. Has any part of the scheme been abandoned? Against the normal schools, which were to be placed under the superintendence of the individual called "rector," the outcry through the country was so great that the Government found it impossible to defend that portion of their scheme. But let it not be supposed that, because they come out with a new scheme, they have abandoned this portion of their former plan. No such thing.

> The committee are of opinion that the most useful application of any sums voted by Parliament would consist in the employment of those moneys in the establishment of a normal school, under the direction of the state, and not placed under the management of a voluntary society. The committee, however, experience so much difficulty in reconciling conflicting views respecting the provisions which they are desirous to make in furtherance of your Majesty's wish that the children and teachers instructed in this school should be duly trained in the principles of the Christian religion, while the rights of conscience should be respected, that it is not in the power of the committee to mature a plan for the accomplishment of this design without further consideration, and they therefore postpone taking any steps for this purpose until greater concurrence of opinion is found to prevail.

Who is to be the judge as to when this increased concurrence of opinion is to take place? It is quite manifest that, while Parliament continues to sit, the concurrence of opinion will be against the committee. But it is equally manifest that the Committee of the Privy Council still cling to this portion of their scheme, and still mean to introduce it, unless the plan be strongly negatived, — and to do that when Parliament is not sitting, which they cannot attempt to do while it continues to sit. When, in some two months hence, Honourable Members shall have returned to their homes, and when the Government will have obtained this grant of money, — not upon the abandonment, but upon the postponement, of their scheme, — then, indeed, it will be an easy matter for the Government to declare that there has been a change in the opinion of the country upon the subject. When you — the House of Commons — shall have consented to yield into their hands these large discretionary powers, it is very possible that the return for yielding them will be, to use those very powers for the introduction of a scheme which, to your face, they would not attempt to defend, but to which they still tenaciously cling. I feel that I have trespassed on your attention too long. I feel that I have very inadequately discharged the duty which I have thought it requisite to impose upon myself; —— but I feel confident in the good feeling which animates the majority of the inhabitants of this country. I feel confident that the majority — that the vast majority of the religious public, of all denominations, have already condemned this scheme, and the council in which it originated; that the bulk of the constituencies in this country have condemned and will continue to condemn it; and I am not without hope that, yielding to the manifestation of public opinion, the majority of this House will not be found, this night, to sanction a scheme which has already been condemned — unequivocally condemned — by the religious public, and denounced by the bulk of the constituencies; — which takes away from the legitimate authority of Parliament that control which it ought to exercise over the education of the people, and vests it in an irresponsible jurisdiction; — which separates the religious education of the established church from the supervision of her authorised ministers, for which, if improperly delegated to laymen, of whatever persuasion, you will have no ground for reproaching them (as they have already altered their scheme once) with changing its entire form and substance, if it so should please them, hereafter; and which, if you do not repudiate at once, you will have lent your hands to the establishment, as I firmly believe, of a system which has a direct tendency to unsettle the minds of the young people of this country; — which will, however unjustly, induce a general belief that, in the mind of the Legislature, an equal degree of authority is due to all versions of the Scriptures whatever; and that it is a matter of perfect indifference in what creed the population of the country shal be brought up; — and, finally, which, by presenting before the eyes of our youth, as of equal weight and equal authority, matters which should be so carefully distinguished as distinct versions of the sacred writings, and essential differences in points of faith, will speedily sap the foundations of all faith, and — what constitutes, in my estimation, the strongest ground of objection to the measure — will gradually lead to general scepticism, and from general scepticism to national infidelity. It now only remains for me to move, by way of amendment, to leave out from the word "That," to the end of the question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to her Majesty, praying that she will be graciously pleased to revoke the Order in Council of the 10th day of April last, appointing a committee of council to superintend the application of any sums voted by Parliament, for the purpose of promoting public education," instead thereof.

On the question being put,—

LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH said: — I was inclined to flatter myself that all essential differences between the Noble Lord who has just sat down and myself were confined to questions relating to Ireland; but I regret to find that, in any expectation I may have formed on this head, I have been disappointed. I certainly did indulge in the hope that, if there was one topic, English or Irish, upon which I might have anticipated the happiness of agreeing with the Noble Lord, that topic would have been the subject of general education. However, the speech to which I have just listened has dissolved this pleasing expectation; for I conceive that the speech of the Noble Lord, and the amendment with which he concluded it, go to this extent, — to separate and divide, by a specific vote of the House, the executive Government of the country — the responsible Ministers of the Crown — from all care, all superintendence, and all control over the general education of the people. Now this, decidedly, is an object wholly at variance with that which I shall seek to attain by my vote upon the present motion. For, so far am I from agreeing with the Noble Lord in such a design, that I own it is my wish that the control and superintendence which the Government is to exercise over the education of the people shall be exercised more largely and fully than it can be under any circumstances that can result from the vote which my Noble Friend the Secretary for the Home Department this night intends to submit to the House. There are, however, many reasons, with reference to the former plan, which are sufficiently strong in their practical effect, if not in abstract reason and theory, for not pressing the interference of Government any further than is at present proposed. Those reasons are to be found in the difference of opinion in this House and in the country upon the subject; they are to be found in the great variety of religious denominations and doctrines which exists in the nation, and in the fact that those who profess these doctrines are more eager to maintain their own tenets, than to tolerate different opinions in others. Under all these circumstances, I think the Government exercise a sound discretion in forbearing to press any further the scheme originally proposed; not because—in spite of all the taunts of the Noble Lord—I have any doubt whatever as to the beneficial tendency of that scheme, or that such would have appeared to be its nature if the matter had been fully investigated; but because I think it better not to press a proposition of the highest importance in the teeth of objections, which, however groundless or mistaken they may be, certainly proceed from quarters quite opposite to each other and from persons who differ in essential particulars. I therefore think that my Noble Friend has exercised a sound discretion in not pressing forward this plan at present; and whether it may give a triumph, or not, to any party, I do not feel called upon, at present, to enter into the merits of the scheme which has been abandoned. I am too well aware of my own deficiencies to encounter the gladiatorial talents of the Noble Lord. When the Noble Lord is so liberal of not the most graceful taunts and imputations against my Noble and Right Honourable Friends, and does not feel himself restrained from using them by the remembrance of his former intimacy and long acquaintance with those Noble and Right Honourable Friends, with whose opinions and conduct he must be so much better acquainted than I am, I feel that I have no right to reproach the Noble Lord with the expressions which he has thought proper to indulge in. But what was the chief point of his speech and amendment? Why, whether the responsible Ministers of the country should have any share whatever, however small, or however curtailed or inadequate, in superintending the general education of the people of this country? The Noble Lord has laid great stress upon the point of the Board of Privy Council being irresponsible to Parliament. Now, I think that, if any board can be considered responsible to the country, one composed of removable Ministers is eminently so, and in a much greater degree than any permanent body can possibly be,—certainly far more responsible than the board which originated with the Noble Lord himself with reference to the sister country, Ireland. Why, the very circumstance that the Noble Lord has chosen for the subject of his taunts is a proof of the responsibility of the board, and shows that the proceedings of the Privy Council have been swayed by the opinion of Parliament and the country; for it is nothing else than the hostile feeling which I have already admitted to exist with respect to the former plan, which has caused the Government to withdraw that plan, and to substitute in its stead one more adapted to obtain the sanction of the country in general. The Noble Lord has complained that, according to this plan, public education will depend upon the discretion and control of a board which is subject to the control of one House of Parliament only, and not of the Legislature; but the present will not be the first grant to which that observation applies. But what are the different circumstances of the proposed vote from those of preceding years? The proposed grant of 30,000*l.*, in this respect, is not a departure from the principles on which the grant of 20,000*l.* was made in former years. I do not say that the two grants do not differ in other respects; but they both concur in this,—that, from their very nature, they are subject to the control of one branch of the Legislature alone. A single vote has been given in this House on each proposition; and it is clear that the other House of Parliament has had no voice in the matter. The Noble Lord has expressed his repugnance to rest the whole public education of the country upon a Treasury minute; while, in fact, it has rested as much upon a Treasury minute for the last four years as it is now proposed that it shall. With my feelings upon the subject of national education, I should be glad to see the establishment of a permanent board, which would command the respect and confidence of the country, and would distribute the funds placed at its disposal in a proper and authorised manner. But, I ask, what are the means, where are we to find the materials, to be employed in constructing such a board? I believe that the Noble Lord, himself, tried to bring together the National Society and the British and Foreign School Society, for the purpose of forming such a body. What was the very first difficulty that presented itself? Why this; — that the National Society insisted upon the Church Catechism being made an essential part of the course of instruction to be given to the schools, while the British and Foreign School Society could not be prevailed upon to sanction any system in which the Church Catechism formed an indispensable article of education.

Now, I beg the attention of the House to the nature of the scheme submitted to them at present, for I can easily understand the dexterity of the Noble Lord in trying to rivet its attention to another scheme, which is not now under consideration. What are the component parts of the present scheme? What is to be the destination of the moderate grant which it is now sought to obtain at the hands of this House? The Ministers have, as I have already observed, been prohibited from establishing a training school for masters,—a normal school, as it is commonly called, formed upon the best method that modern experience and knowledge can furnish; and I admit I shall ever glory in that part of the plan, instead of for one moment denying it, under which masters of all denominations and distinctions of religious profession could be reared, for whom there could be a demand throughout the country. From this intention, however, which, I still maintain, would have been a most beneficial one, the Government have been diverted, and they now propose to grant one third of the whole amount voted to the training schools of each of those two great educational societies, the National Society and the British and Foreign School Society. As I hold both these societies in great honour and respect, — the one as possessing the confidence of almost all the members of the Church of England, and the other as possessing the confidence of the greater part of the dissenting bodies in this country, as well as that of very many members of the established church, — I rejoice that an equal portion of the grant is to be given to each of those societies; I should be unwilling to draw any invidious distinction between them. Sir, notwithstanding the clearness which is usually to be found in the Noble Lord's speeches, I felt a little at a loss to understand upon what footing the Noble Lord wishes to rest the public aid to be granted for the purposes of education. When the Noble Lord states that there can be no education without religion, but that religion ought to be interwoven with every part of the system, there is no one who is ready to give a more unmixed concurrence to that proposition than I am. But when the Noble Lord quotes from old French statutes, and cites Lord Chief Justice Holt, with other quotations, carrying the mind back to feudal times, I wish to ascertain whether the Noble Lord means that the system of education to be established now, is to be regulated upon the model of the feudal times? And when the Noble Lord says that it is not expedient to take the education of the children of members of the Church of England out of the hands of that church, I cannot help asking, who has ever made any such proposition? I quite assent to the proposition of the Noble Lord, when he says that education cannot be separated from religion; but I feel some difficulty in laying it down as broadly as I understood the Noble Lord to do, that education may not exist apart from the church. I admit the correctness of the Noble Lord's statement, when he says that, in the present plan, there is a departure from two rules which have been previously observed, — the one of these being, that the public aid shall be proportionate to the amount of private subscriptions in the district; and the other being, to extend that aid to no schools except such as are connected with the two societies to which I have referred. Now, as to the first of these points, — the dependence of the amount of public aid on that of private contribution, — the course now proposed to be taken is so far from being a plan suggested for the first time by the Government, that I find it recommended in the Report of the select committee upon the education of the poorer classes, presented last year, in these terms: —

> That the amount of assistance afforded by Government should be regulated as heretofore, subject to modification of their rules in cases where the poverty of the district may be found to require it, — the special ground being reported in each case.

From the spirit of this recommendation neither my colleagues nor I have any wish to depart. If the rule were not subject to such a modification, it might exclude from all participation in the bounty of the state, districts where there exist the largest population and the greatest destitution, but which are prevented by their comparative poverty from contending successfully in the race of competition with their more opulent neighbours, who may stand less in need of public assistance. With regard to the other point, — that of extending the benefit of the grant in some cases to schools unconnected with either of the two societies,—I feel no wish to disguise my opinion, that the first duty of the Committee of the Privy Council, or of any board in which it may be considered proper to vest the functions now discharged by that committee, is, to extend by far the greatest proportion of assistance to the most numerous body of persons in this country, — namely, those who have confidence in these two societies; yet I think it would be fair, and just, and proper, when any application is made for a grant of the money of the nation for the general purposes of education, that no considerable body of persons whatever should be excluded, formally and irrevocably, from the intended benefit, — it being always understood that to entitle themselves to it they must, in point of numbers and destitution, make out a fair and reasonable claim. I am, I repeat, unable to understand the grounds of the present objection. In opposition to the former scheme of the Government, it was objected that it was impracticable; and that it was a wretched compromise, because it attempted to unite the education of children whose parents held different religious opinions. Now, whether those objections were well founded, or not, they were certainly intelligible. I might consider it inconsistent in the Noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley) to make such objections, while he lauds the system adopted by the British and Foreign School Society, which is, in fact, the same as that which the Noble Lord inveighs against so vehemently. But still the objections, themselves, could be understood. But no such union is proposed now. The Noble Lord appears to have shifted his ground, and to oppose the present scheme with equal vehemence, although that ground of objection is removed. What is the principle, then, on which the Noble Lord wishes us to act? Is he prepared to say that it would be right and proper to exclude certain proscribed classes in this country from the benefits of the public grant, or the blessings of education, merely in consequence of their not being mixed up with one or other of these societies? I have no high opinion of many of the doctrines of the Roman Catholics; I have my own notions respecting Unitarian tenets; and I think that, the state of opinion prevailing in this country being Protestant and Trinitarian, those who hold to such class of opinions are entitled to have the greatest proportion of all public grants for objects of this nature applied for their benefit; but, nevertheless, as long as the state think proper to employ Roman Catholic sinews and to finger Unitarian gold, it cannot refuse to extend the blessings of education to those by whom it so profits, in not allowing them to remain in a state of physical misery and intellectual blindness. The Noble Lord makes great objection to the appointment of inspectors, and to the power which is reserved to the committee of introducing such improvements as experience may suggest. Now, I think that the spirit which prevails throughout the Report of the council completely refutes the unfair insinuation that any offensive regulations will be introduced under this power. What are the words of the Report already quoted by the Noble Lord? Why these: —

> That the right of inspection be retained, in order to secure a conformity to the regulations and discipline established in several schools, with such improvements as may be suggested by the committee.

Thereby implying that the original design of the schools is to be kept closely in view. It is clear that it is not intended to introduce any improvement that shall not be entirely consistent with the original designs of the several schools; and I think it too much to say that no improvement of such a nature will be introduced, if, on inquiry and examination, it may seem necessary. For these reasons, I think the right of inspection ought to be retained. The Noble Lord has, himself, acknowledged that where the state does endow any public body or institution, we should be able to say that a proper power of inspection is guaranteed, to insure the fulfilment of the object in view. I think that that could not be satisfactorily done by the exertions of private societies; for unintentional anomalies and irregularities may creep into even the very best of systems. Much as I admire and approve of the general system of operation of the two societies to which allusion has been so often made, I do not think that any one will be found to assert that all the schools connected with those societies are carried on with a proper degree of efficiency and regularity. It is for the purpose of introducing a better method, but, at the same time, in strict consistency with the original design of those societies, that the state is desirous of retaining the power of education; and if it be desirable that that power should be kept in view, and systematically acted upon, I know none upon whom it could more properly devolve, than the responsible Ministers of the Crown, who are the servants of the public,—to whom complaints of every description are naturally carried,—and who, if any misappropriation of the public funds shall have prevailed, or be suspected to prevail, will be at hand to give the necessary explanations. The Noble Lord has thrown out sundry objections against the constitution of the committee. Of course, if the persons composing that committee fail to enjoy the Noble Lord's confidence, that is a point upon which he has a right to make up his own mind, but upon which I cannot be expected to concur with him. The Noble Lord seems to think that it would be more fit and proper to have ecclesiastical authorities placed upon the board. In my opinion, it would, immeasurably, increase the jealousies and soreness which are unhappily too rife in the country, if ecclesiastical authorities were actually constituted members of the board. If the Bishop of London, of whom the church is so justly proud, were placed upon the board, Protestant Dissenters might think themselves entitled to the same advantage, and ask to have Dr. Pye Smith, or some other distinguished dissenting divine, placed upon it, also; and after the debate of a previous night, on the subject of a petition purporting to come from the Archbishop of Tuam, it would not be very surprising if a demand were likewise made to place upon that Board of National Education some holder of episcopal jurisdiction in partibus infidelium. Let the prelates and pastors of every denomination tender, as organs of the several bodies with which they are associated, such suggestions and advice as they may think best calculated to carry out the common munificent end which all have in view; but do not give them such undue influence as would but prove injurious to the attainment of that object. By adopting this course, instead of the course suggested by the Noble Lord, you will avoid giving rise to those impressions of favouritism and exclusiveness which will necessarily be created if these persons are to be constituted the authorised dispensers of the public funds.

I will not attempt to follow the Noble Lord into the more general view which he has taken of the subject. If Honourable Gentlemen on the other side of the House are of opinion that they can propose a scheme more likely to reconcile conflicting objections, and yet to give as much education as possible, their plan will occasion, on my part, no other feelings than those of congratulation. But, for the present, I shall be content with any beginning, however humble, which will extend the blessings of education, without infringing, in any respect, upon the religious rights and liberties of the people. I confess I am comparatively indifferent to any abuse that may be heaped upon us in the prosecution of such an object. Neither am I so anxious as some Honourable Members seem to be about the particular and specific form in which a vote upon the subject is brought before the House. What I wish is, a system of national education. I desire to have Churchmen better educated, Dissenters better educated, — those whose belief is called orthodox, and those whose belief is called heterodox, — in short, the great mass of the people I want to have educated, in a better and more efficient manner. This is all I desire; for the more any one is convinced of the truth, the justice, and the trustworthiness of his own opinion, the less will he be afraid of any examination or competition; and I must say, if the opinions which I hold to be true are destined to fall, I would rather, infinitely, that they should fall, not prostrate under the mass of undiscerning and brutal ignorance, but under the weapons of enlightened and well-informed opponents. I think that hitherto all parties have been deficient in their duty upon the subject of national education. I do not wish to excite any angry recrimination by reference to what has passed; but I cannot avoid saying that I think that the church, that the state, and that Dissenters generally have been, hitherto, too deficient in their duty upon this subject. I am rejoiced to see a prospect of better things before me, — I am rejoiced to see the competing energies of every party revived, — and I am willing to lend my humble aid on this, as I shall be on every future occasion, to the further development of what I conceive to be a great work of national improvement, and of atonement for past neglect on our own parts.

LORD ASHLEY. — Sir, if I had not before entertained very serious misgivings in reference to the intentions of her Majesty's Government on this most important question, I must say that the speech which we have just heard would be eminently calculated to produce them. The Noble Lord has plainly, told us that not only does he think that the Government of this country ought to exercise a control and guardianship — at present exercised — over the education of the people, but that he wishes that that control and guardianship were more widely extended. The Noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department has withdrawn his first plan of education, and proposed another, which, in my opinion is equally objectionable; for, although I do not see in these two plans an identity of language, I clearly distinguish an identity of purpose. They are animated by the same spirit; they tend to the same end; and, if they are not controlled by a vote of this House, they will unquestionably work out the same results. What powers, I should like to know, were conferred, by the first minute, that are not reserved to the Privy Council by the second? The first declared what powers were to be exercised, and the second reserves the optional exercise of those powers. The second certainly does not state, in terms, that a normal school or that a model school will be erected; but is there anything in that second minute to preclude it? Are we not even told, in plain terms, that the first plan — that favoured scheme of Government, and against which the country made so bold a stand — is not suppressed, but only postponed? Are we not told that the Government are only reserving it for further consideration? Has not the Noble Lord expressed a hope that that postponement would not be of long duration? Have we not heard him, a Minister of the Crown, say that he still entertains the same opinions on the subject? That being the case, the Noble Lord, as a man of principle, will no doubt avail himself of the very first opportunity of carrying out that which he considers to be essential to the wellbeing of the community. But it is not the party to which I have the honour to belong, who — alone — are of the opinion that the powers stated in the first minute, and supposed to be abandoned, are still reserved by the Committee of the Privy Council, to be exercised, in all probability, on the first opportunity. Has the Noble Lord read the resolutions which were agreed to at a meeting of the committees of the Wesleyan Methodists held on Monday and Wednesday last, and other Wesleyan meetings of the day? If he has, he must have found that the party on this side entertain no scruples which are not participated in by that class of the community. At the meeting to which I have just alluded, the following resolution was one of a series that were passed: —

That the regrets of this meeting are necessarily associated with feelings of continued apprehension and alarm, when they further learn from the recent "Report," that the Committee of Council have not by any means explicitly and frankly abandoned the plan in question, but have simply withdrawn it for the present, on account of the "difficulties" which they experienced "in reconciling conflicting views;" reserving their original design "for further consideration," and, stating that "they therefore postpone taking any steps" "until greater concurrence of opinion is found to prevail."

I will also quote the opinion of other parties — of persons not supposed to nourish the same apprehensions which are conscientiously entertained by Honourable Gentlemen on this side of the House.

The modified proposition for an educational grant is, it appears, to be disputed as strenuously as if it had continued unmodified. In this there is nothing surprising. Considerable good still remains; and to any good of this description Toryism is opposed. By the proposition, as it now stands, the Committee of the Privy Council will have the right of suggesting improvements in the schools, connected with either the National or British and Foreign Society, which may receive portions of the grant. They will not be tied down to the very absurd rule of proportioning the amount of the Government grant to the amount of private subscription, — a rule which inevitably makes against poor localities, and in favour of wealthy ones, although it must be that in the former the assistance is most needed. In fact, the rule must frequently be the complete inversion of what it ought to be. Nor will the grants be restricted to schools in connection with the two great societies.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — What is the authority from which the Noble Lord is quoting.

LORD ASHLEY. — I will tell the Noble Lord presently.

An unfettered discretion is proposed for the committee. They would even be at liberty to make advances to a normal school, should there be one, instituted by Mr. Wyse and the Central Society of Education. Reason does really exist, therefore, for the approbation of certain parties, that education may be both amended and extended; and as there is no counteracting machinery in the proposition, no provision for limiting education or deteriorating it, the conclusion is inevitable, that the improvement and extension of it are the actual stimulus to the hostility already evinced, and that which is threatened.

These are not the observations of a Tory writer; this is the language of a writer who is a chief supporter of her Majesty's Government, — I allude to the editor of the Morning Chronicle.

[Laughter.]

The Noble Lord and Honourable Members may laugh at this authority — well and good; — it may suit their purpose to do so, now; but I only quote this as the language of a man of most able and acute mind, who can bring to bear as much intelligence and information upon any subject as any person in this House. I ask then, Sir, what is to protect us against a revival of the first plan? Who is to be the judge of a greater concurrence of opinion? Is there anything in the language of the document itself, or anything in the conduct of her Majesty's Ministers, that we can with confidence rely upon? I apprehend not. If the Noble Lord be not disposed to carry out all the objectionable principles of his first plan, why does he not tie up the hands of the committee by a Bill which shall leave no doubt upon the subject, and under which no mischief can arise? Sir, I feel that this is a painful discussion, — a discussion which calls for the most open avowal of opinions, — one which, I must say, was forced upon this House by the solemn nature of the propositions submitted by her Majesty's Government, — and one on which I feel that I must either say what may chance to be unpleasant to some persons in an assembly of mixed opinions, or be silent altogether. I can, however, assure the House, that while I shall speak with all the liberty which I am ready to concede to others on matters of belief, I shall do so with the strongest feeling of personal respect towards every Member in it. I beg to assure the Noble Lord the Secretary for Ireland, that any statements I may make shall not be "mendacious;" and I also assure all Honourable Gentlemen in this House, of a different persuasion from myself, that if I use the term "Roman Catholic," it will be in no invidious spirit, but simply as an appellative distinction, as they themselves might use the term "Protestant" in speaking of the particular faith which I profess, and which I believe to be the true one. Sir, the importance of this subject is too vast and too sacred to admit of suppression or compromise. It involves the control and influence over the youthful mind of the country, and consequently the temporal and eternal destinies of countless millions. The scheme propounded to the House, I believe to be hostile to the constitution of the country; I believe it to be hostile to the established church, — nay, I believe it to be hostile to revealed religion itself. I must certainly admit that it can scarcely be called unconstitutional, — and I do not assert that it is; but a measure may not be precisely unconstitutional, and yet may be very adverse to the constitution under which we live, by giving an exaggerated and undue stretch of prerogative. Her Majesty, for instance, has an undoubted right to call to her advice any members of her Privy Council she may think fit; and they have a right to suggest that advice, and ask a vote of money from the House of Commons to carry that advice into effect. Her Majesty may, if she please, declare war, when war would be very injurious to the country; and her Majesty has also the power, if she see fit, to create an unlimited number of Peers, and to deluge the Upper House of Parliament.

[Cries of "Oh!"]

I merely say this to illustrate my argument, — that though a measure may not be absolutely unconstitutional, it may, nevertheless, be very adverse to the constitution; and to show that the prerogative may be improperly exercised. In this light do I view this Committee of Privy Council. The preamble of the document before the House is by no means in keeping with the rest of it. From the one part of the document, we might infer that the board is purely ministerial, — that they are merely intended to distribute the money granted by the House; but how widely different are the functions assigned them by the rest of the document! The committee is not only to distribute the funds intrusted to its charge, but to invent and enforce new schemes of education. It is to determine not only in what form the people are to be instructed, but what that instruction is to be. It is to say what is the form of belief to be propagated, — what is to be common to all, and what is to be considered special to the few. It is to lay down not only what things are to be taught, but to specify what things are to be taught, and what withheld. It is also to enact rules according to which we are to afford assistance. What enormous powers to confer upon any body of men! and what a precedent to establish for future Governments to follow! True, we are only called to vote 30,000*l.* this year; but there will be no obstacle to our being called upon next year for 1,000,000*l.*, — and that for the purpose of acquiring a dominion over the whole mind of the country. The Noble Lord has not stated why he submits the question in its present shape, instead of a Bill. Does he mean to say that it is one which does not demand the attention of the whole Legislature, or that the opinion of the other House is of no consequence upon such a subject? Surely the introduction of a Bill would have been a course more consistent with the sacred importance of the subject, inasmuch as it would be sent to the House of Lords, — the only place where the church is represented, — and there receive the benefit of their Lordships' deliberation. Shall it be said that we send up a Railroad or a Turnpike Bill, or any measure of minor importance, for the sanction of the House of Lords; and that yet, in a matter of such vast national importance as this we simply ask for a money vote, — thereby facilitating the passage of that which would be rejected by the other House, and which has been objected to by the community at large? It is next to impossible to enumerate all the objections that exist to such a course of proceeding, and to such a scheme. You will establish a precedent which, in other times, and with a another Government, — I do not speak of the present Government, — may lead to measures injurious, nay, destructive, to the constitution. It is in this view that I consider this plan hostile to the constitution.

Sir, I likewise consider this plan hostile to the church; for, by it, the church will be deprived of all superintendence over all schools which shall accept the grant from Government. Almost all the new schools, and, probably, half the old ones, will require such assistance; and from these the superintendence of the church will be excluded, or, if admitted, it must be so, in conjunction with the state inspector, — which amounts to virtual exclusion. Thus, according to this plan, the funds of the state are to be employed against the church; and, surely, if you refuse to aid the church with the funds of the state, you are at least bound to take care that those funds shall not be devoted to purposes which would be prejudicial to her very existence. Then, by your system of normal schools, you propose to train up a body of masters, each in his own tenets, although it is perfectly well known that many of those tenets are irreconcileably hostile to the Church of England! Thus the established church is placed in this position; — she must either consent to part with the superintendence of her own schools, by accepting the grant; or she must forego the grant altogether — and thus present the anomalous spectacle of being the church, recognised by the state as the national establishment, and yet being the only body precluded from sharing in the national benevolence. And thus the bench of bishops are completely set aside by this Committee of the Privy Council, and the church is compelled to resort to voluntary assistance. In this way the Dissenters, who adopt the conditions, will obtain the whole benefit of the funds intended for national education, and the church will be prevented from taking any part in superintending her own schools. This constitutes the whole difference; for, if the inspection which is demanded is to be such as the Church of England annot accede to, will it not be most unjust, as regards the church, to insist upon it? According to the minute, the terms of which are wide and undefined, the Committee of the Privy Council are to have the power of making all regulations for the discipline of the schools, as well as of suggesting any improvements in the system which they may see fit. What those improvements may be, is a matter totally undefined, and no limitation is placed upon the power given, in this respect, to the Committee of the Privy Council. It has been said that these improvements will not alter the discipline of the schools; but, certainly, that does not appear from the words of the minute itself. We have no guarantee on this subject; and I will only say that I have no more confidence in the opinion of the Government, than I have in the system of education now proposed. The Noble Lord opposite, the Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire, has told us that the powers granted will not be abused. With every possible respect for the declarations of that Noble Lord, I must be allowed to say that the speeches of a Member of this House do not afford the species of guarantee to which the country is fairly entitled. It is for this reason, as well as on many other grounds, that I must say we are bound to guard ourselves against giving to any body of men a power so unlimited and so indefinite — a power which may be applied to purposes most destructive to the national religion of this empire. I am told that the present vote may be made annual. True, it may be: but I beg to remind the House that the present Session is drawing to a close; that many months may elapse before Parliament again assembles; and that, within that period, an incalculable amount of mischief may be perpetrated, — seeing how completely without control the operations of the board are to be left. Who are the parties who are to exercise those powers? Are they men who are fit to deal with the Holy Scriptures? The subject with which they are called on to deal, is one beyond their grasp and comprehension; at all events, it is one for which they are fitted by neither station nor education. But suppose the church shall prove unable to accede to these conditions, as is known to be the case with respect to the Wesleyan Methodists; what must be the result? Why, that the whole fund at the disposal of the Committee of the Privy Council — that the whole grant of 30,000*l.* — will go, not to promote the doctrines of the national church, — not to promote those doctrines in which the Wesleyan Methodists concur with the church, — but, in support of schools established by persons belonging to the Roman Catholic faith, or by Socinians, — by persons of no faith at all, or of that party-coloured piebald faith which distinguishes the Central School Society. This must clearly be the result; and hence it is that I think the minute reprehensible, when it lays down, in such vague and indefinite terms, a plan that renders it impossible for two of the largest bodies in the country — bodies which comprise eight tenths of the religious community of these realms — to accept a single farthing of the grant under such conditions.

Now, when we consider this, have we not a right to inquire what is the guarantee that the members of the new board are to be members of the Church of England? I look not at the present, only, but to the future; and I am led to make these observations, because it does not appear that the members of the board must necessarily be, also, members of the established church. When I reflect on the gravity, the importance, the holiness, I might say, of the functions with which this board is invested, — when I consider the enormous power placed in their hands, to establish model schools, normal schools, appoint chaplains and rectors, superintend the reading of the Scriptures, lay down rules and regulations, and, in short, exercise undefined, unlimited, and unprecedented authority, — how extraordinary, how reprehensible does it appear, that, to advise on all these high and momentous matters, there is no one bishop, no one representative of the episcopal bench, no one representative of the church government under which we live — included in the board. All these things have been left to laymen, — in matters, too, where it was almost inevitable they should have very little experience, and certainly no sound and accurate knowledge. I now come to the model school. The model school, according to the Noble Lord, is to be a single school, and not subject to imitation. If this be so, I should like to know what the Noble Lord means by "a model" school? Unless it be intended for imitation, how can it be a model school? and is it not perfectly clear that, if such a school were established, it would be imitated in Birmingham, Manchester, Liverpool, and other large towns? This is evident from another paragraph of the minute, which says that the Committee of the Privy Council shall have power to appoint licensed ministers to give religious instruction, whenever the children in the model school exceed a given number. From this it is evident that model schools will be set up in all the great towns. The word in the minute is not "whenever," but "wherever," — a distinction which I think most material. It is obviously intended, that, in whatever place a model school is set up, the board shall have the power to appoint a licensed minister. I regret the unlimited discretion left in the Privy Council as to the distribution of the funds. The effect of this, in but too many cases, will be to give encouragement to those bodies who manifest a lack of zeal, at the expense of those whose zeal is the most distinguished. It is cherishing dissent at the expense of the church; and it will support, out of the public funds, many sects, who, without such support, would either fall to the ground, or become absorbed in some body of the established church. I object, also, to the whole education of the country being placed in the hands of men of strong political bias and connections. That upon which their power is to be erected, proves a subject of the very gravest importance, — it is nothing less than an alteration in the whole mind of the country; and why, I would ask, are the Committee of the Privy Council to have the power of aiding dissent by establishing schools for the use of sectarians, wherever they were themselves unable or unwilling to do so, — and that, too, at the expense of the state? Is it, I ask, fitting, that political men should be intrusted with such power in relation to matters affecting, in the very highest degree, the temporal, and even the everlasting, condition of the people committed to their charge? Sir, I look with the greatest apprehension on this Hydra. I cannot but apply that term to the wild scheme before the House; though I should be the last man in the world to use such an expression in reference to genuine education, — to that which I regard as the first duty, not only of public men, but of every man in private life, — the contributing to the temporal welfare of one's fellow creatures, and the aiding them in the attainment of everlasting felicity. The House is called on, this night, to affirm a new principle in the history of this country and of its church. They are called on to affirm that every man has a right to be trained, at the expense of the state, in the faith in which he was born.

I am glad to ascertain by that cheer from the Government, that this is really the fact; and that the principle countenanced by their cheer is, in fact, contained in the two minutes, particularly in the second minute. If, then, every man is to be trained, at the expense of the state, in the faith in which he was born, why is this not avowed in explicit terms in the minutes? What, too, is the meaning of the limitation expressed in the first minute, — "that, after children attending the model school shall have attended for a certain period, then, and then only, shall they have the benefit of a licensed minister to train them in spiritual matters?" If this be the principle avowed by the Government, it goes to recognise, for the first time, the doctrine that all forms of belief, and that the ministers of every denomination, are equal in the eye of the state, and equally to be maintained by the state. The Noble Lord opposite seems to dissent: perhaps he will show me the distinction between this statement and the principle admitted by the Noble Lord's cheer ——

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I merely meant to intimate that I was not one of those who cheered the Noble Lord.

LORD ASHLEY. — Far be it from me to show up any dissension which may exist between Ministers sitting in the Committee of the Privy Council. But this, at least, is clear; — that a more crude, and I must say ignorant, proposition never was submitted to any assembly, than that which we are now discussing; in proof of this, I have only to refer to the fact, that the two Ministers of the Crown who are to form one half of the whole Board of Privy Council, sitting side by side in this House, give each other the most flat contradiction on the subject. I have no doubt the dexterity of my Noble and Right Honourable Friends will enable them to reconcile the difference between them; but, certainly, they now appear to me "wide as the poles asunder." This affords another proof, however, that a scheme of this sort, affecting the temporal government of the church and the spiritual interests of a large body of the people, should not be discussed and disposed of, on a single vote. The subject ought to have been submitted, in the shape of a Bill, to the deliberate and serious consideration of Parliament, after an opportunity had been afforded for fairly canvassing its merits throughout the country at large. It is true that the country has already, up to the present moment, expressed its opinions openly and most vigorously upon this subject; but Government, having in the mean time propounded a modified scheme, they assume that the hostility which has been manifested was directed against the former, and not against the present, measure. The fact is, the people of this country understand the two schemes to be identical; and my firm conviction is, that as great opposition will be brought to bear against the second plan as was manifested against the first. Yet a little time, and the country will call with one unanimous voice for the destruction of this moustrous anomaly — this hideous chimæra of the Committee of the Privy Council.

[Cries of "Order, order!"]

It is not often in the course of the Session that I address the House; and nothing, I solemnly assure them, but the deep and conscientious conviction which I entertain, could have induced me to come forward at all on this subject. But, having undertaken to do so, I cannot refrain from declaring the whole of what I feel, and of the opinions which I most seriously entertain. I say, I cannot help saying what I feel; and by God's blessing I will do so. It is my solemn belief that this plan of national education is hostile to revealed religion itself. It is not necessary for my purpose to charge the Members of the Privy Council with that intention. I do not so charge them. I would not charge them, or any body of men, unless I knew the fact, with such an awful intention. But I speak of the plan as it comes before me; and that is my solemn and deliberate conviction. It is not only my conviction, but the conviction of nine tenths — I might say ten tenths — of all those with whom I have conversed. And this I say, having conversed with men of all ranks, of all turns of thought, and of various sects. In the Government plan it is proposed to divide religion into general and special. What is the meaning of that? Was there ever such a thing known? — and to be put, too, in the very frontispiece of a system of national education! It is no less than a disjunction of the most sacred truths; and I say, "what God has joined, let no man put asunder!"

[Laughter.]

Sir, I will not be put down by a laugh. I say it with great deference to the Gentlemen who think fit to laugh, that if they laugh at such a subject as this, they do not represent the people of England. I do not believe that you could get together ten thousand persons in Palace Yard who would receive with contempt a religious sentiment. I repeat, that this division of religion into general and special is a disjunction of sacred truths; and where do they find it? What is their authority for making it? What right has the Committee of the Privy Council to put, in the frontispiece of a system of national education, a distinction that does not exist? Where do they find it? Do they find it in the primitive fathers? Do they find it in the founders of the reformed church? This distinction does not exist in any writer that I know of. It does not exist in the Bible itself; nor can it be proved from anything in the sacred volume. The discovery was reserved for the crude, and I must say presumptuous, analysis of the Committee of the Privy Council. It is said that religion is to be combined with the whole matter of instruction. Is it the general or special religion that is to be so combined? Can you answer that question? Do you mean, when you use the term religion, a part or the whole of religion? What right have you to withhold any part of the word of revelation? By this division of general and special, you may include every, or exclude any, religion. You may include the Deist, who takes the religion of nature. You may exclude every single form of faith, by rejecting their specialties. You separate doctrine from precept, and destroy the sanctions of the precept by suppressing the doctrine. You would teach children that moral precepts are of great value, because they are of universal application; and you would likewise teach them that doctrine is of inferior value, because it is necessary only for a few: — that is the principle laid down. You cannot escape from the conclusion, that what is necessary for all, must be of more value than what is necessary for only a few. You declare that general religion — by which, I suppose, you mean moral principles — is superior to special religion, by which you mean the special doctrines and peculiar truths of the Gospel. In a letter which has appeared in the papers from Doctor Kaye, and which, I suppose, from the situation held by that gentleman, must be supposed to be official, there is a most infelicitous example of what is meant by general religion. The writer quotes the Sermon on the Mount as an illustration of what is meant by general religion. Was there ever a more unhappy instance? What is the value of the Sermon on the Mount? Whence does it derive its sanction and authority, but from the person by whom it was spoken? If, in teaching the children, you suppress the character of the person by whom it was spoken, or undertake to teach children, as you are about to do, by special ministers appointed for that purpose, — that the character which that person assumed, and which nine tenths of the people of England attribute to him, was not his true character, — how can you, in such case, put forth the Sermon on the Mount as an instance of general religion? We are told in the Epistle to the Hebrews that it is the privilege and peculiarity of Christianity that it was a faith, — a doctrine, not delivered by a secondary person, nor by a prophet, but from the very mouth of the Son of God himself. The instance which Dr. Kaye gives of general religion is, of all others, calculated to show the inevitable necessity you are under, if you would have children grounded in their faith and in the truth of the Gospel, of pointing out to them the specific, unmistakeable character of the person who, in delivering the Sermon on the Mount, gave validity, and the only validity, to the precepts it contained.

Now, I do not believe that her Majesty's Privy Council had any right to give its sanction to such a document as that to which I have alluded. When I say right, I do not mean constitutional right, — but I mean that, in consideration for the feelings of the great majority of the people in this country, they were not justified in issuing such a document. It is a document in direct opposition not only to the feelings of the established church, but in opposition even to the feelings and wishes of the Wesleyan Methodists. In the model school which is to form part of the proposed normal school, this distinction of religion into general and special is to take place; and when it is objected that religion is not to be taught in this school, the objection is met by a reference to the clause in the minute, which states that religion is to be combined with the whole matter of instruction. But I ask, again, what kind of religion can you teach, if you abstain from teaching any special creed, and from enforcing any special doctrine? If the children are to be taught this general religion together and in open school, and then to be taken asunder for special instruction in the tenets of each, can that system have a beneficial effect upon the children? Can it be beneficial to them to be told, so early in life, that religious opinions are so shifting and varying, — that some may be taught one thing and some another, — that there is no certainty whatever, — and that the instruction given in one place is the reverse of the instruction given in another? I will imagine a case which might easily occur. I will imagine three children sitting side by side, — one a member of the Church of England, another a child of Socinian parents, and the third a child born of Jewish parents. Let those three children read together in school, during the time of general instruction, some particular portions of the Bible,—suppose the 53d chapter of Isaiah. Let those children be taken away immediately after, for the purposes of special instruction, to be received by each from his own minister. What would be the effect on the minds of those three children? The child of the Church of England communion would learn the great, necessary, and saving truths in which nine tenths of the community agree. The Socinian child would be taught that what the Church of England child was required to believe was a gross error,—namely, that the person to whom that prophecy referred was, in fact, no better than a mere man. But the Jewish child would be taught to believe that the whole thing, from first to last, was an absolute imposition. It is impossible that these children could think any belief, established or certain. The result must necessarily be universal scepticism, or a universal belief that there was nothing necessary — nothing certain. It is a new thing for the state to undertake to teach contradictions. If the state refuse to teach the true doctrine, it certainly is not at liberty to teach what it believes to be false. What a spectacle will you present to the eyes of the civilised world, if, while you support the established church because you believe its doctrines to be true, you set up Socinian teachers and Socinian schools, to controvert and overthrow the doctrines and opinions entertained by that church? A Noble Friend of mine in this House once asked me, "What is truth?" That question might be asked in any country but this, or by a man who professed to belong to no creed; but how a man professing to belong to the established church of England could ask what was truth, is to me a wonder. Perhaps it was a flourish rhetorical; but, even as rhetorical, it was a question which no member of the Church of England had a right to put. The state adopts the Church of England as the true church; and if it do not enforce her tenets in education, it has no right to countenance those of other professions. Sir, I have no authority to speak for any but myself. But I know the sentiments of a great many of my fellow countrymen; and I am perfectly satisfied that I express their opinion in saying, that if the state will not teach truth, it is far better that it should not teach anything at all. I cannot understand on what principles the state should undertake to teach what it knows and declares to be false. It would be far better that nothing should be taught, than that error should be propagated, and that the Church of England, established by law, should be called upon to preach from her pulpits the great, saving, and necessary doctrines of Christianity, while the state should, at the same moment, establish ministers in her schools to controvert, and, to the utmost of their power, to overthrow, those same great, necessary, and saving truths.

Another difficulty connected with this system must arise from the various versions of the Scriptures which must be admitted; because, if permission be given to use the Popish version, it cannot well be refused to the Unitarian version. It has been said by Dr. Kaye, that no harm would accrue from this part of the system, as the Romish version of the Bible would only be given to the children when they were placed in separate apartments, according to their creed. Now the minute says, that a portion of every day is to be devoted to the reading of the Scriptures in the school, under the general direction of the committee, and superintendence of the rector; and, further, that Roman Catholics, if their parents or guardians require it, are to read their own version of the Scriptures, either at the times fixed for reading the Scriptures, or at the hours of special instruction.

How, then, can it be asserted, after the alternative so expressly laid down in this paragraph, that the reading of the Roman Catholic version of the Bible is only to be permitted at the hours of special instruction? There are a great many objections to the reading of the Roman Catholic version of the Bible, which I deem it unnecessary to mention on the present occasion; but the very circumstance of having conflicting versions of the Bible in the schools — as, for instance, the Unitarian version, in which parts are struck out as apocryphal which we deem authentic, and the Roman Catholic version, where parts are introduced as authentic which we deem apocryphal — must, of necessity, lead to the most injurious consequences. Again, it appears from the minute, that the normal school, to the establishment of which I have many objections, is only to be postponed for a time. The Noble Lord, the Member for the West Riding, has stated, most distinctly, that he considers the normal school of the greatest importance; and that, in his opinion, an appropriation of the public funds to its support is highly advisable. Now, the model schools naturally follow the establishment of the normal school, and they are so connected with each other as to be inseparable. Let the House, then, look to the qualification of the teachers. It is stated, in the minute, that "the religious instruction of the candidate teachers is to form an essential and prominent element in their studies." That immediately raises the question, "What is that religious instruction to be?" Are we to understand that persons of all religious denominations are to be taught alike at the expense of the state? Are we to understand that Roman Catholics and Socinians are to be trained and fostered at the expense of the state, to enter, hereafter, as teachers of their respective doctrines, into schools licensed and supported by the state? It appears, from the minute, that "no certificate is to be granted, unless the authorised religious teacher previously attests his confidence in the character, religious knowledge, and zeal of the candidate whose religious instruction he has superintended." Hence it is evident that, unless such a certificate be granted, every candidate must be rejected. What would this lead to? That all conflicting opinions would be so entirely impressed on each sect, that any one teacher who might exhibit the possibility of his deviating into truth would be rejected by the committee. The day schools must necessarily be constructed of all sects, to afford the teachers an opportunity of practising their skill; and when that skill is exercised, what a picture will be presented to the country,—what a Pantheon will be erected in the midst of it! But why is all this necessary? Why do you wish to change a system that is already working well? The Church of England is charged with bigotry, exclusiveness, and monopoly, because she resists the scheme proposed by the Government. Why is she to be charged with bigotry, when, if she accepts that scheme, she must surrender her own principles? Why is she to be charged with monopoly, when she asks for no grant,—when she makes no demand for assistance? Has she desired any scheme of national education? No; all that she has asked for, and all that she now asks for, is, that, if you are determined to establish a system of national education, it should not be one that is conflicting with her doctrines. Why is she to be charged with exclusiveness? Has she protested against the distribution of the 20,000*l.* annually granted for the purposes of education? Was that sum given to her friends exclusively? No; she has consented that other sects should receive some of the contributions of the state,—and, in so doing, she has abated something of church principles; but she does protest against any abatement of those religious principles which she deems essential and of vital importance to the best interests of man. And when the clergy of the established church are charged with being indifferent to the progress of education, and with not having done anything to forward it, will those who make such charges allow me to state the results of the inquiry I have made, as contained in the last Report of the National Society of London, which proves them most satisfactorily. In that Report is the following statement:—

> The society has, by grants from its own funds to the amount of 120,659*l.*, directly aided in the erection of schools in 1553 places, to the extent of two or three schools each in most of the parishes so assisted, and trained at its central school in London 2695 teachers. The number of schools actually united to the society is, at this time, 6778, which contain 597,911 children; whilst the total number, supported wholly or in part by benevolent individuals for the instruction of the poor in the same principles, amounts (as ascertained by the last inquiry made by the National Society in 1837) to schools, 17,341; scholars, 1,003,087."

It must be borne in mind that the sums granted by the National Society from its own funds are exclusive of the Government grants; so that the whole amount of grants, which have been distributed through the National Society, for building schoolhouses alone, in twenty-eight years, since its establishment, amounts to 190,781*l.*

You may find fault with the mode of instruction; but I think you must admit, after this statement, that the Church of England has made great efforts to impart to her members improvement on subjects of vital importance both in this world and the next. You may find fault with her pride; but you cannot deny that she has given to her members a sound moral and religious education. What, then, is the time which her Majesty's Ministers select for bringing forward their plan? It is precisely that time when the church has made the most unprecedented efforts, and has introduced large reforms in the mode and matter of her instruction,—just at the time when she has made an appeal unprecedented in the history of the country,—just at the time when she is carrying its action over all the length and breadth of the country. I will not enter further into the statement of what she has done in this respect, and of what she is capable of doing; for I trust that that task will be undertaken by my Noble Friend the Member for Somersetshire (Mr. Acland), who is most competent to discharge it. Neither will I detain the House by inquiring, further, whether it is fit that the revenues of the state should now be employed in maintaining and supporting that which is hostile to her interests? I will only ask the Noble Lord why he persists in urging this motion against the feeling of nine tenths of the people of England? What is his end in so doing? Success is hopeless. The Noble Lord may carry his vote in this House, but he must see that he will not be able to execute his plan elsewhere. He may obtain a triumph, a mere insulting triumph, over the feelings of the people of this country. But what say the resolutions of the Wesleyan Methodists? Are not those resolutions as strong as — and even stronger than — any of the language which I have, myself, used in addressing the House in opposition to this motion? And will the Noble Lord altogether set aside the feelings of those excellent and exemplary men, who, though they differ little in faith from the church, yet, in ordinary times, stand aloof from her, but who, nevertheless, have manfully come forward in her defence, in this crisis of her danger? For it cannot but be borne in mind that, in this late movement of the Wesleyan Methodists, they have exhibited a degree of generosity which reflects on them the highest honour. By the first minute, the Wesleyan Methodists could have had no share in this educational grant; by the last minute they are brought within its conditions. They have, however, generously discarded all views of private interest; for they see that, if they do not shut the door at once against abuses, they will be opening a path to error, which they may, perhaps, never have the opportunity of closing hereafter. This ought to be known, to their great credit, — for it shows that they are acting, not from party or political motives, but with the most perfect sincerity and disinterestedness, from the most exalted motives which can adorn and dignify human nature. I therefore now give notice, that, if it should be deemed advisable by her Majesty's Ministers to revert to their first minute, I will move an Address to the Crown, praying that the Wesleyan Methodists be admitted within the terms of the grant as a third society. Let me ask the Noble Lord whether he doubts the intentions of the Church of England at this moment? The Noble Lord may call its conduct bigotry and fanaticism; but I maintain that it is the solemn sentiment of a nation, and, as such, entitled to respect. Would the Noble Lord force his plan upon the country? That would be persecution; and the more ridiculous, as it would be undertaken to carry out principles which, as members of the established church, he must deny. I recollect, well, the time when the Dissenters petitioned for the abolition of church rates, on the ground that they ought not to be called on to support a church in whose doctrines they did not believe. The Dissenters, on that occasion, pleaded conscience; the Government allowed their plea, and proposed a remedy for what was called a grievance. It was, however, left in a minority; but its proceeding, though unsuccessful, ought not to be forgotten. It proposed to do away with an impost which had existed for 800 years, and under which all the landed property of the country had been taken by its present owners and occupiers. Now, Government propose to force on a large majority of the country a novel tax, for the purpose of giving instruction in creeds which they consider to be unscriptural and false; and which they declare to be repugnant, not only to the feelings of the church, but also to their faith and religion. I know that, in making these remarks, I expose myself to the charge of illiberality and bigotry. I regret it; but I could not, for any consideration, consent to abate the expression of any one of the sentiments which I have avowed this evening. I have no objection — on the contrary, I am most anxious — to receive any plan which shall tend to the moral advancement of the people of England; but I never will consent to a plan that will sever religious from secular education. No; I will risk any obloquy, I will dare any contempt, I will incur any hazard, I will put in jeopardy any one thing in this country, rather than, by departing from the true and simple faith of the Gospel, assent to a system of religious education which would inculcate the worship of saints, or deny the validity of the Scriptures.

Mr. HAWES. — Of all the great questions which have been debated since I have had the honour to hold a seat in this House, I do not consider that one of them has involved a principle of higher importance than that which is now before us. It has come to this issue, — I rejoice to see that it has come to this, — for the vital principle of religious liberty is now at stake; and now it is, that all who are determined to abide by the principles of the equality and impartiality of religious liberty throughout the country should give a hearty and steady support to the proposition of the Government. This great principle was recognised by the Toleration Act; it has more recently been enforced in the repeal of the Test and Corporation Acts; and, still more recently, by the passing of the Catholic Relief Bill. If anything more than another could give me pain, it is to find such a subject introduced to the notice of the House with so much bitterness of feeling — with such intensity of uncharitableness — as have marked the speech of the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire. I own that, from the Noble Lord, I expected — and I had a right to expect, notwithstanding his present political associations — that a far different course would be pursued; for, short as has been my experience in this House, yet it has been sufficiently long for me to be able to remember with what satisfaction I listened to the Noble Lord, in a speech upon this very subject, distinguished not less for its eloquence than for its liberality, and in which he advocated principles that I entertained in common with himself, but which the Noble Lord seems to have forgotten in the debate of this evening. When, then, the Noble Lord began taunting the Noble Secretary for the Home Department with the facility with which he slips away from the various plans which he proposes ——

— then the Noble Lord may permit me, with all humility, to say, that I should much prefer to bear the accusation made against him of slipping away from a plan or two, than slipping away from all the great principles which he had once professed. I well remember when the Noble Lord opposite made a most eloquent speech on this subject, — one that is so fresh in my mind that I can instantly turn to the page in which it is recorded, in order to remind the Noble Lord of the great and enlightened principles which he once entertained with respect to education. The Noble Lord may be assured that the extract which I beg leave to read is from a speech of the Noble Lord which does not refer to Ireland, — I am coming nearer home, — it was made by the Noble Lord with respect to the admission of Dissenters into the Universities in England, and the system of education to be adopted in those institutions. The Noble Lord showed the manner in which effect should be given to the principle to be enforced in education. That which I am now about to read I am ready to abide by. They are the words of the Noble Lord, who then spoke of the effects of one common system of education, and who thus describes them: —

By bringing into one common system of education, and that not an irreligious system, all the various classes of Churchmen and Dissenters in this country, you will sink religious rancour and animosity, and establish in the minds of the youth of all sects and persuasions, a bond of harmony and friendship which the struggles and vicissitudes of after life will not be sufficient to break, and which, to the community at large, will be communicative of the greatest benefits and advantages.

Now, having read that extract, I should much like to know how all classes of Churchmen and Dissenters are to be thus united by any system of education which stands exclusively upon a creed or a catechism. But the Noble Lord continued, —

I am most anxious to afford the established church every protection and support which can and ought to be given to it consistent with justice to all classes of the subjects of this kingdom; but of this I am confident, that it will not be best maintained by keeping up a system of injustice and exclusion; and, if I may be allowed to express an opinion on the subject, I will frankly say that, in my mind, the main cause of the spread of dissent has been occasioned amongst the lower classes by the insufficiency of the education and religious instruction with respect to the tenets of the established church, and amongst the higher classes by that strict line of exclusion which those who are desirous to protect the church have drawn around it. I am satisfied that, if you intend to attach particularly the higher classes of Dissenters to the established church, you can take no more effectual course to attain that object than by giving them a full participation in the same civil privileges, and admitting them to the fullest, freest, and most unreserved intercourse with the members of the Church of England in our general and national institutions.

Now, I should wish to know whether any feature can be more strictly consistent with the Noble Lord's views than that which marks the plan proposed by the Noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department, — a scheme by which Churchmen and Dissenters will be educated together, and taught to forget the points of difference between them, and, if possible, to prize those in which they agree? The Noble Lord professes to admire, very much, that plan by which the Treasury heretofore allotted sums to different school societies in proportion to the sums subscribed, by private hands, to each. I now wish to ask, is it just that the wealthiest and the largest societies should receive the greatest portions of public bounty? If all contribute to a common fund, ought not all to participate in its common advantages? No, says the Noble Lord; there may be some district marked by poverty and dissent; and in that district, where a large sum ought to be expended, it is ruled, according to the plan praised so highly by the Noble Lord, that such district shall be especially excluded from the blessings attendant on education.

We now come to consider the plan proposed by the Government; but I must first allude to the gross misrepresentations which have gone abroad with respect to this plan. There have been the grossest misrepresentations adopted with respect to it — so gross and so false, that I cannot believe that they are perfectly free from wilful deception.

[Laughter.]

I perceive two Honourable Members opposite who seem to be exceedingly amused at this: to them it has certainly been of singular advantage; and it is in proportion to the amount of misrepresentation that has been employed, that they have received support. Discussion, however, has at length taken place on the subject; and the longer it prevails, and the more general it becomes, the better; so that at length this question, I believe, will be one which Honourable Gentlemen opposite will be the last to face in this House. In the borough which I have the honour to represent, and whence several petitions have been sent to this House, I shall just give the House a specimen of the manner in which persons are induced to sign petitions against the Government plan. This is a hand-bill.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!" from the Opposition benches.]

Yes, but it is most authentic and most official; for it is signed by the churchwardens, and it is put forth as authority and information which are intended to be conveyed to the people, and to guide them. The Bill is to this effect: —

We, the undersigned, severally churchwardens, take the liberty of directing the attention of the parishioners to a scheme about to be brought before Parliament, which has for its ultimate object the introduction of mutilated Bibles, and Romish and Socinian catechisms, into every National School in the kingdom.

Now, if it had been said that it was intended to turn the British and Foreign schools into Socinian and Romish schools, it would be something to be believed; but when they say that the object is to introduce Romish and Socinian Bibles into national schools, no human being can be so credulous as to believe them. As to the British and Foreign School Society, I may say that Honourable Gentlemen opposite have stigmatised the dissenting body with an indifference to religion; but I now ask, are they less careful in matters of faith, or less firm in their Protestantism, than members of the established church? I rather think that among Protestant Dissenters are to be found the true principles of religious liberty; and they have stood up, on many occasions, to vindicate the rights of Protestantism, when members of the Church of England have slumbered at their posts. The Government plan, at least, is marked with the just and generous features of religious liberty; and embodies the great principle, that the public money levied under its provisions shall be impartially applied for the benefit of all her Majesty's subjects. I have never read any public document with so much satisfaction as that which has been laid on the table of this House respecting education, by the Noble Secretary for the Home Department,—and on the authority of which, the sentiments of her Majesty, regarding education, are conveyed to the people of England. On this subject, the letter states, "I need only say that it is her Majesty's wish that the youth of this kingdom should be religiously brought up, and that the rights of conscience should be respected." Now, I ask Honourable Gentlemen opposite, do the national schools respect the rights of conscience? Are not the conditions insisted upon, that the creed and catechism shall be learned, and that there shall be attendance at church? I am glad that the question has been brought to this issue. Fortunately, we have now come to a period when the Crown and the people are on the side of the just principle — the rights of conscience. But I do not fear the result, if you only give time for further discussion. Sir, I find that, upon all sides, education is regarded as a subject of the first importance. To me, then, it is rather melancholy to reflect, when I look at the tables of crime in this country, to find that education and instruction have been as little forwarded, as the diminution of crime is little remarkable. A heavy responsibility, therefore, is incurred by those who shut the door of the school-house against a large population, while they are quite ready to pass stringent laws to punish any deviations from rectitude, which, in a great degree, are the result of ignorance. When I turn to the criminal returns made to the Home Office, I find that, in the degrees of instruction or ages of persons prosecuted last year, there appears but little change, as compared with those of the preceding years. I find, from the criminal returns of last year, that persons entirely uninstructed, or so badly instructed as only to read and write imperfectly, made up three fourths of the whole number convicted. I must say, then, that it is a most melancholy thing that we should be discussing questions about systems and plans, and wrangling about the privileges of this or that sect, while crimes continue to increase at such a fearful rate in this kingdom. I did hope to hear, in the course of the evening, from Honourable Gentlemen opposite, the value of education discussed apart from peculiar religious tenets. I have, however, heard nothing from the other side of the House but this cry, "Let us take care of the established church, and let crime continue just as it is."

I say this distinctly. If Honourable Gentlemen opposite mean to shut the doors of their schools upon all who differ from them in religion, what a fearful increase will not their proceeding give rise to in the amount of crime, on the part of those excluded? The Noble Lord who last spoke has taken great pains to show that this plan is unconstitutional.

LORD ASHLEY. — I beg to be allowed to explain. I drew a distinction. I said that it was hostile to the constitution, and not that it was unconstitutional.

[Cries of "Oh!" and laughter from the Ministerial benches.]

Mr. HAWES. — I will take the Noble Lord's own words. The Noble Lord, then, did say that the present plan was hostile to the constitution. At all events, let us understand this,—that the placing of education under the control of the Executive, for the equal and impartial diffusion of knowledge amongst the people, is by Honourable Gentlemen opposite considered hostile to the constitution.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

I admit that it is indeed hostile to the old Tory constitution. Ay, and I believe that there is a feeling of hostility on the part of the people towards that old Tory constitution. When the people have a little more knowledge——

—knowledge of which the Noble Lord and his friends cannot now deprive them — they will very soon replace that old constitution by something much better and more substantial. The Noble Lord (Lord Ashley) also says that rather than the state should not teach the truth, it would be better to teach nothing at all. I should like to know by what high authority the Noble Lord is to ascertain the truth? I should like to know how it becomes any member of a Christian church to say, "I alone am in possession of the truth, and all who differ from me are wrong?" I could quite understand such language proceeding from the Pope.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

I can quite understand such language coming from the Vatican. I mean no offence, — I should be ashamed, either in word or thought, to offend any human being; and although this sentiment may be met with a jeer and a laugh from Gentlemen opposite, I am not ashamed to avow it. I say, then, that I quite understand that this sort of language may proceed from the Vatican; but how it can proceed from an English Protestant, whose faith is founded on the Bible, and connected with the right of private judgment, I cannot understand. How this language can be reconciled with the good old doctine of Protestantism, as I have read it in the old Divines of the English church, I am utterly at a loss to conceive.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

I feel sure that the Noble Lord must have dipped into a system of theology, of late, that partakes more of Romish than Anglican doctrines. The Noble Lord is understood to say that the present plan works well. I want to know the difference between the plan that is now acted upon, and that which is really before the House. The Noble Lord who last addressed the House, and the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire, in some of the more effective and biting portions of his speech, took especial care to confound both plans; and, indeed, I cannot believe that those Noble Lords are very anxious to draw a clear distinction between them. The Noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department has undoubtedly been driven from his first scheme. I am sorry for it. I regret that the present plan is not more acceptable, and still more divested of everything like a sectarian character, — because under this plan a Jew, for example, must be refused education; and I know no reason, under a national system of education, why we should exclude any one of her Majesty's subjects on grounds of mere faith. I should be glad to know from any one of the great advocates of national education, upon what grounds and principles he would exclude a member of any church? Great efforts have been made to show that the system of education proposed is altogether divested of religious instruction; but how any person can candidly and fairly read the minutes of the Privy Council, and the papers that have been laid before the House, and come to the conclusion that the Government plan is deficient in this respect, I cannot imagine. No doubt it is a matter of extreme difficulty to take any line that shall reconcile the great and contending opinions of religious parties. The effort has, however, been made, and it has failed.

Digitized by Google

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

It has failed, certainly, from the union of the high church party and its new allies, the Wesleyan Methodists; but it remains to be seen, when the question has been more discussed, and is better understood, whether the great body of the Wesleyan Methodists will be disposed to be dragged at the wheels of the church? What is the difference, then, between the present plan and that which has been acted upon? The present plan is nothing more than a continuance of the plan upon which the Government has acted for some time past. I speak the sentiments of a very large body, — I believe I speak the sentiments of the great majority of those whom I represent, — when I say that I am thankful to the Government, and rejoice to find that upon the question of education they have come to an issue upon these grounds; and I believe that, by standing up manfully in support of a sound system of national education, the Noble Lord below me will do more to attach the Liberal party to him than by any other measure that he could propose. If that Noble Lord will but manfully adhere to this principle, I, as a very humble member of that body, will tell the Noble Lord that he need entertain no fear for the success of those liberal opinions, whenever the contest takes place, because he will be supported by the good sense of the country.

LORD F. EGERTON. — If, Sir, consistently with the due discussion of the important question, and the usual practice of the House, we could have come to a division after the speeches of the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire and the Noble Lord the Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire, I should have been quite content not to have attempted any interference in the discussion; and I do so now with great reluctance, because I feel that anything which I can say will only tend to weaken the effect which I am sure my Noble Friend's (Lord Stanley's) speech must have produced upon the House, and will produce, when it has gone forth, upon the public. I do not wonder that a certain degree of irritation has been displayed, both during and after the delivery of that speech, by the Honourable Gentlemen on the opposite side. I do not wonder that the Noble Lord has been charged with having used harsh epithets, — that his speech has been styled intensely uncharitable. I believe it will be intensely inconvenient to the Government which has proposed this measure, and intensely effective on the intelligence and religious feeling of the country. The Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down has endeavoured to reply to it by a quotation from a former speech of my Noble Friend. God knows, if my Noble Friend's defence rested on me, I should feel perfectly inadequate to the task; but as I believe that, by the forms of the House, my Noble Friend, on this night at least, will have no opportunity of replying, I will just state, — although I was not present at the discussion of which the speech in question formed part, and I speak not from authority, — that I consider the Honourable Member for Lambeth has quite misunderstood and misrepresented my Noble Friend's observations. In those observations, as I have heard the Honourable Member read them, I should have no difficulty in expressing my full acquiescence, however much I may differ from the Honourable Member on the present question. I understand the observations to have been delivered during a discussion on the question, whether Dissenters should be excluded from the Universities, by being required to subscribe to the Thirty-nine Articles. The scope of my Noble Friend's argument, couched as it was in eloquent, forcible, and just expressions, I apprehend to have been, that the previous exclusion ought no longer to exist, and that Dissenters should be admitted, subject to the regulations that now exist; but I do not apprehend that my Noble Friend intended to admit conflicting or imperfect versions of the Scriptures. My Noble Friend has been accused by the Noble Lord the Member for the West Riding, of arguing that the members of the Government, the depositaries of official power, should not be allowed to interfere with the support of education in this country. I understand my Noble Friend to argue no such thing; but rather that it would be inexpedient to give, by a vote of this House, power to four members of the Privy Council to direct this great system, free from all control on the part of the House, and to solve, without reference to the House, all those important, and, as I believe the Government has found them, insoluble questions, attached to the subject of, as it is styled by the Honourable Member for Lambeth, "national education."

It has been said that there is no difference between the system now proposed, and that which has been for some years acted upon by the Lords of the Treasury. I certainly perceive some difference between the plan contained in the vague minute which has been laid on the table, and a power in the Treasury to supply a portion of the public funds to two societies, whose rules, principles, and modes of action are understood, and printed and published to the country. I find no likeness in this to the power given by the minute to certain members of the Privy Council, who are irresponsible, and the method of those societies, which are managed by persons who are responsible to the public. As I have said, I interfere in this discussion with reluctance; but I own that I feel it necessary to occupy the House, if it be allowed me to do so, but a moment, from the circumstance of my having had upwards of fifty petitions against the scheme intrusted to me, the bulk of which are from Wesleyan Methodists; and which, though I have been unable, myself, to present them, have fallen, I am glad to say, into the more able hands of the Noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire. Now, with reference to this and other proofs of the unanimity of the great body of Wesleyan Methodists, I must say that I am almost inclined to attribute more weight and authority, on this question, to the expression of opinion of that great body, than even to that of the opinion of the leaders of the establishment, to which it is my happiness to belong. I think the former expression of opinion will carry with it more weight and authority to the country, because I conceive that it, perhaps, may be said that the establishment is at present exhibiting some degree of hostility to the existing Government,—of not unmerited hostility,—owing to the degree of experience which they have of the course of general policy which the Government pursues towards them. The Honourable Member for Lambeth (Mr. Hawes) has intimated doubts of the permanency of this feeling among the Wesleyan Methodists; but, for my part, I see no reason to doubt that it will be permanent, because it is based on a deeply fixed religious principle. However, I am willing to believe — I may say I am certain — that whatever may be the real qualities of these propositions, they are dictated by a deep feeling of the general want of education throughout the country; and I am quite ready to admit that the intention of her Majesty's Government is to set on foot a better system of education; but in seeking to effect this, they have risked greater interests even than those of education, — they have incurred the danger of substituting poison for that meagre diet — if meagre it be — on which it is their object to improve. For myself, however, I must say that it surpasses my comprehension to find any material difference between the former and the subsequent plan of the Government. The Noble Lord apparently labours to draw a strong distinction between them; but it seems to me that in the second minute are substantially contained all the powers necessary for resuscitating, at the proper season, everything in the first minute to which I, and those who think with me, object. I see no reason why the Committee of Privy Council, — whenever it shall please them to form for themselves the assumption that there exists in the country a greater concurrence of opinion in their views than is at present conceded to them, — should not seize a fitting opportunity, — such as that of a recess of Parliament, — for the revival and reconstruction of that edifice of education which is planned out in the first minute. The Noble Lord opposite seems to disclaim such intentions; all I can say is, that with no more information than that on the table, I find it impossible to penetrate the designs of Government.

Another objection which I feel to the scheme relates to a part of the subject to which the Noble Member for the West Riding of Yorkshire has referred, in speaking, as I regretted to hear him do, of the impossibility of putting on this board any of the leading members of the established church, or any of its most distinguished ministers. I regret this, because I think it looks like an insult or slight put upon the church; though I fully believe that the church will willingly overlook any slight which it may be thought proper to put upon her, if to do so will at all serve to the advancement of a sound and religious education of the humbler classes. But I object not so much that no leading member of the church has been placed on the board, as that the scheme has been adopted without consulting with, or anticipating objections which might be expected to be urged by, the leading members of the establishment. Several of the more eminent members of the hierarchy have loudly objected to the scheme; there are sitting among the most earnest opponents of it, bishops created by the present Ministry. It is not opposed only by prelates created by former Governments, but by prelates who were appointed yesterday, as it were, and I think that the Noble Lord has no grounds to hope for success to his scheme, resisted as it is by the most distinguished men in the church, as well as by so large and distinguished a portion of the dissenting body. I am afraid the Noble Lord will look long for that general concurrence of which the minute speaks. I am afraid that is an event which will be postponed even beyond that happy period — the year 1842 — which is to settle all the difficulties of the Canadian question. It seems to have given great offence to the Noble Lord opposite, that my Noble Friend near me has not chosen to dwell on the subject of the appointment of chaplain under the plan; but I beg leave to suggest, that, where prelates of their own creation are so much opposed to it, — that, if I might say so, it will be difficult to find a good education bishop on the bench, — they are most likely to find it impossible to get any one from the lower ranks of the church to desert those ranks, and become chaplain on the terms laid down; and therefore I think my Noble Friend is not guilty of any great disrespect to the Noble Lord in not referring to the subject. The question having undergone a degree of discussion which has very nearly exhausted the subject between the Noble Lord opposite and my Noble Friend who followed, I shall not trouble the House further than to say that I feel that I should not fulfil my duty to my constituents, nor to the large body of persons who have done me the honour to confide their petitions to me, if I did not express, in the strongest manner, my dissent from the plan proposed by the Noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department, and my determination to give all the support in my power to the motion of the Noble Lord the Member for North Lancashire.

[Loud cries of "Divide, divide!"]

Mr. SLANEY. — I assure the House I shall trespass on their attention but for a very few moments.

[Renewed cries of "Divide, divide!"]

I am quite aware of the responsibility that attaches to me in venturing to trouble the House with a single observation, after the very able and eloquent speeches which we have heard in the course of this discussion; but feeling the great importance of this question to the country at large, — what vital interests are involved in it, — I felt that I should be neglecting my duty if I gave a silent vote on this occasion. Sir, I deeply lament the tone of party spirit which this debate has assumed. I deeply regret that the question of education should have been chosen as the battle-field upon which the two great opponent parties in this House are to try their strength; when, by the exercise of a little spirit of moderation and conciliation, a good understanding might have been effected upon many points on which I am certain the great majority of the House cordially concur. I am convinced that there are a great number of Honourable Members on the opposite side of the House, who, however they may disapprove of the Government plan, are as anxious as I am myself, for the promotion of the blessings of education amongst the humbler classes of the people. This, Sir, is proved by the great attention which was paid to the investigation of this subject by the members of the committee (many of whom I see opposite) which sat last year, and of which I had the honour — most unworthily, I must say — to be chosen chairman. But, Sir, I must be allowed to add, that the recommendation contained in the Report of that committee contains, in my opinion, the most complete reply to most of the objections that have now been urged against the Government proposition. In speaking of that proposition, I wish it to be understood that I throw out of the question that which is not really before the House, — I mean the plan that was first proposed, and from which, in many respects, I differed, — and I confine myself to that which we are actually discussing. It appears to me, Sir, that the resolution which was moved in the committee of last year, by the Noble Member for Liverpool (Lord Sandon), furnishes an answer to much that has been urged in favour of the amendment of the Noble Lord opposite (Lord Stanley); for its effect was, that the grant should be continued to be distributed by the two societies, but varying the application of it as circumstances might require. Now that was, in spirit, tantamount to the resolution proposed by her Majesty's Government. I admit that the former plan was good, as far as it went; and that, through the medium of the two excellent societies to which allusion has been made, a great benefit was conferred on the poorer classes; but what I objected to was the provision, that, before any assistance should be given to any particular place, an amount equal to that proposed to be given must be subscribed towards the required funds: the consequence of this restriction was altogether to exclude the poorest places, in which subscriptions could not be raised, from all assistance; and I am sure Honourable Gentleman on both sides of the House will agree that those are the very places which most require, and are best entitled to, assistance from the grant. Then, Sir, was it not necessary to introduce a principle by which the benefit of the educational grant might be extended, and by which it might be made available to those who were most in need of it? Well, then, one of the objects of the present Government scheme is, to effect this improved distribution of the money; and with this part of it I cannot see how Honourable Gentlemen opposite can differ.

But there is another part of the scheme proposed, which may probably be objected to; that is, the power which the Government reserve to themselves to make grants to schools which are founded not immediately through the medium of either of the two societies — the National or the British and Foreign. Now, as I understand it, the intention of the Government is this; — that, if there be a school requiring assistance, — connected, for instance, with that very excellent and useful society, the Infant School Society, — such assistance shall be given. Although those infant schools do not belong to either of the two principal societies, yet they adopt their principles. And will Honourable Gentlemen say that all schools of this description ought to be excluded altogether from participation in the benefit of this education grant? The point in dispute is this; — ought assistance to be given in all cases where the necessity for it can be shown, or not? I will suppose that both sides are agreed that assistance should be given through the medium of the two societies; the question then arises, — is it to be confined to those schools which are in connection with them? Does the Noble Lord opposite mean to say that no assistance of any kind should be extended to those who may stand in need of it, if they cannot conscientiously conform to those two societies? I know it has been said that Dissenters will come in under the British and Foreign School Society, and that those who belong to the established religion are provided for by the National School Society. But there is yet another and a very large class of persons who require to be educated, and who do not come within either of those denominations, — I mean the great body of the poorer Roman Catholics, who are to be found in very many of the large towns of this kingdom. You have lately introduced a new system in Ireland; and, by clearing the estates there, you cause a large emigration to this country. Now I ask you, how — when you are about to extend the assistance of the state to educate the people — are you prepared to exclude altogether the great body of Roman Catholics in our manufacturing towns from participating in the benefit? If the numbers were small, it might then be a matter of less consideration; but I find that, in the town of Manchester alone, there are no less than 30,000 Roman Catholics, and there are about three times that number in London. I ask you, then, — and I appeal especially to the Irish Members of the House, — calmly and fairly to take these matters into your consideration, and that you will think deeply of the consequences of denying all the advantages of education to so large a number of your Roman Catholic fellow subjects in this country, before you decide upon rejecting the Government plan. Let me ask those Honourable Gentlemen who were members of the select committee, whether important facts were not there brought forward, showing the paramount necessity for some exertion being made to instruct and improve the lower classes? I ask them, was not the great prevalence of crime in this country clearly traced to the uneducated state of the poorer classes?

If the House will allow me, I will add one or two of those facts, which will be found more conclusive than any arguments I could use. And, first, I will refer to the resolution which the committee came to, after much investigation and attention. They stated, in regard to the education in the manufacturing and seaport towns, that the kind of education bestowed upon the working classes was as lamentably deficient in amount as it was bad in quality; and that the subject was one which demanded some immediate efforts on the part of the Government to remedy. I will now proceed to state ——

[Cries of "Oh, oh!" and, "Question!"]

I must appeal to Honourable Gentlemen for their attention for a few minutes. I speak on behalf of the heartfelt desires and interests of hundreds of thousands of my fellow countrymen, whose affection for their children is as great and as sincere as that which any Gentleman who hears me can entertain for his own offspring, and who are compelled to witness them going on in a career of danger, leading to ruin, shame, and misery, for the want of the commonest means of education. The following facts are strictly in proof of what I say: — In Reading, the proportion of persons who have received any kind of education is but 1 in 17; in the eastern parts of London, 1 in 21; in the south-west of London, 1 in 27; in Manchester, 1 in 35; in Birmingham, 1 in 38; and in Leeds, 1 in 41. In short, two thirds of the children of the humbler classes are entirely without education. The consequence of this neglect is, that the criminal calendar is yearly increasing; and it appears that, out of 22,000 committals in the present year, 20,000 were of persons wholly destitute of education. And is not this fact alone sufficient to show that, by allowing things to go on as they are at present, we are not only casting a great additional burden upon the public purse, in the shape of prosecutions, but also acting most unjustly towards the unfortunate people who are amenable to the laws of the country? There is another fact which bears strongly on this matter, as showing the absolute necessity for a more general system of education. The consumption of spirits, which, thirty years ago, was 9,000,000 of gallons, is now no less than 39,000,000 of gallons annually.

[Cries of "Divide!" and, "Question!"]

I have never said anything to excite discontent in the humbler classes of the people; my opinions are not those which can be called extreme; but I do say this, that if the Government of this country do not afford the great bulk of the people those elements of education by which they may be taught how to live and how to die, discontent will arise in the popular mind, and mischievous persons will get up and ferment that discontent, declaring that that Government is unjust and tyrannical, which proscribes those who do wrong, but neglects to afford the opportunity to its subjects of discovering and doing what is right.

[Cries of "Question, question!"]

This is the question, and a question of deep interest,—whether or not we are to deny to the humbler classes the benefit of education, and thus betray that trust which, as representatives of the people, is imposed upon us. I will only add, that, if you do not speedily take measures for extending to the humbler classes of society the means of obtaining a good practical education, it will be found, ere long, that those classes will be beyond the rule of any Government, and that anarchy and ruin will result.

[Loud cries of "Divide, divide!"]

SIR WALTER JAMES. — I am desirous of addressing a very few words to the House on the present occasion. On account of the great interest which my constituents take in this question, my own attention has of late been directed to it; and I rejoice that it has been so, because I think that, by the public attention being directed in this way to this subject, a fresh stimulant will be given to exertion — to those who are already engaged in the good work of educating the people; and to those who have hitherto limited their efforts to the imparting of what is termed useful knowledge; and that a fresh stimulant will be given to the dissenting body, also, which has been so properly eulogised to-night by the Noble Lord (Lord Stanley); and, also, that a fresh stimulant to renewed energy will thus be given to the clergymen of the established church, themselves, to promote and spread the principles of that religion which they profess, and which it is their duty to preach and to practise, and which it used to be the pride and honour of the people of this country to sustain and uphold. I must, however, be permitted to say, that I look upon it as a strange and striking anomaly, that Honourable Gentlemen opposite, the constant advocates of a voluntary system in religion, should be the first to advocate the establishment of a so-called national system of education, which is alien to the wishes, the wants, and the feelings of the people of this great nation. I wish to call the attention of the House to the position in which the clergy of the established church are placed by this question. After what has been stated by the Noble Lord, it can scarcely be necessary to say that, when Lord Althorp, six years ago, announced that all public money to be applied by the state for the purposes of education should be given to the British and Foreign School and the National School Societies, no objection was made by the church to that proposition. On the contrary, the clergy of the established church fully acquiesced in that proposal; and when it was wished afterwards to ascertain which stood highest in public opinion, in order to guide the Government in the distribution of the public money, it was found that 120,000*l.* had been given to the National School Society, and only 80,000*l.* to the Dissenters. Such was the ratio of public opinion. But no sooner was it known that such a strong predominance of public feeling and support has been evinced in favour of the National School Society, and the principles of instruction inculcated by the established church and the Protestant religion, than the Government come forward with a new-fangled scheme of education, and denounce that plan as objectionable and illiberal. They declare that the education of the people must be taken out of the hands of the clergy, and vested in a Committee of the Privy Council, wholly consisting of official laymen, possessing neither the confidence of this House nor of the people. All that the church ask is, that there shall be no favouritism — that no plan of education shall be patronised, which will interfere with the rights and privileges of the established clergy as guardians of public instruction; and in asking this much, the church seek for nothing that is not reasonable and most entirely just. I am the more urgent with Government to consider the objectionable and dangerous nature of their scheme, because I am convinced that no system of education can succeed in this country which has not the support and approbation of the parochial clergy. Still I do not wish to push my objections to any extreme extent; and if I saw the parochial clergy endeavouring to monopolise the rights of other sects with regard to the education of their children, I should be the first to oppose such tyranny. But as regards their opposition to this scheme of her Majesty's Government, the church stands upon a position which her enemies will endeavour in vain to shake; it is founded upon a firm rock, — the rock of truth and justice, and of public approbation and esteem. I must say that the church, in this respect, stands in proud and striking contrast to her Majesty's Government, whose measures I have always regarded with suspicion, and more particularly since the time when the President of the Council published his plan to the country, as described in the printed papers laid on the table of this House. For myself, I was brought up in that old-fashioned plan which taught me to think that morals and religion are so intimately connected and blended together, that it is impossible to teach the one without inculcating the other. If I wished, in the present day, to teach morality, I do not know where I should go.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and laughter.]

Her Majesty's Government have been compelled to abandon their secular system, because it has met with the strenuous opposition of all classes throughout the country. There are one or two questions, with respect to the late plan, which I wish much to put to her Majesty's Government. I wish, first of all, to know whether it is still intended to found any normal or model schools, and to give away any part of the public money to such purposes? I wish, also, to know whether it is intended to bestow any part of the public money on the Roman Catholic sect? I wish to speak with all due respect of Roman Catholics; but I must say, that, if the Government apply any portion of the funds of the state to such purposes, and on this plan, they will adopt a course most hostile and unjust to the rights and interests of the established church. I do not, however, look for an answer to these questions, because I have long ceased to expect anything like straightforward conduct from her Majesty's Government. But it certainly appears to me that it will be quite impracticable to carry on education in this country by public grants, unless we adhere to the line laid down by Lord Althorp, to which I have already alluded. This is the only course which can be attemped with just claims to success, — with anything like due regard to the rights of the established church; and it is the only plan which can have a chance of allaying and satisfying the well-grounded fears entertained by the Conservative party in the country.

[Cries of "Divide, divide!" and, "Adjourn."]

Mr. WYSE. — I move that the debate be adjourned.

On the question being put, —

SIR R. PEEL said: — I think it will be impossible to bring on the discussion on the Jamaica Bill on Monday, as the debate on the Report of the Committee of Privileges will necessarily take up a considerable portion of time on that day.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I would propose that the question of privilege shall be taken the first thing on Monday; we may then take the chance of bringing on the Jamaica Bill in the latter part of the evening; the adjourned debate might then be taken on Wednesday.

Mr. PAKINGTON. — I have a question of very great importance to bring forward on Wednesday; and unless I persevere in pressing it on that day, I am afraid I shall not have another opportunity.

Motion for adjournment agreed to.

The SPEAKER. — To what day?

Mr. WYSE. — Till Wednesday next.

On the question being proposed, —

Mr. PAKINGTON said: — I must again object to the debate being fixed for Wednesday, as it will interfere with other business which is already fixed for that day.

The question was then put, and agreed to; debate adjourned till Wednesday next.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WALLACE. — I should like to know from the Noble Lord, when the Bills which are now on the paper relating to Scotland are really to be brought forward? or whether it is intended to postpone them till the next Session?

LORD VISCOUNT STORMONT. — It is of great importance that we should know which of the Government measures it is proposed to carry through during the present Session, and which are to be abandoned.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I really do not see how we can answer the question. This is not a period of the Session at which we should be likely to abandon any measure that we considered would be approved of by Parliament.

LORD VISCOUNT STORMONT. — What I request to know of the Noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department is, when it is intended that the Scotch Bills — six in number — shall be proceeded with? or whether, indeed, any of them will be proceeded with further during the present Session? It is a plain question, and I wish to have a decided answer.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I can only say, in reply to the Noble Lord, that immediately the Government have decided on the course they will take, the House shall be informed of it; but they are not prepared to come to an instant determination on the peremptory demand of the Noble Lord.

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — From my experience of the practice of former Sessions, I should say that, at this period, the House ought to know what Bills are to be proceeded with. Nothing is more natural than that such a question as that which my Noble Friend has put to the Noble Lord should be asked. At so late a period as the 15th of June, it does not appear to me to be unreasonable that the House should desire to be informed as to the course the Government intend to pursue during the remainder of the Session.

Mr. GILLON. — It is not at all unreasonable that the House should be told what Bills relating to Scotland are to be proceeded with. At all events, if the Government persist in refusing that information, it is right that the public should know the fact of that refusal.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I am aware that the Bill respecting prisons in Scotland is one which excites a considerable degree of interest; and I hope that that measure may be carried through during the present Session.

REGISTRATION OF ELECTORS BILL.

Committees severally deferred till Thursday next.

METROPOLIS POLICE AND METROPOLIS POLICE COURTS (ADVANCES OUT OF THE CONSOLIDATED FUND).

On the motion of Mr. FOX MAULE, order for committee thereupon, read.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I must, Sir, object to the House going into committee for such a purpose at so late an hour, and I shall certainly oppose the motion.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I hope the Honourable and Gallant Member will not press his opposition; if he does, the charge of delay, as regards these Bills, cannot, with propriety, be brought against this side of the House.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I move that the House be counted.

House counted accordingly; and forty Members not being present, House adjourned at a quarter to one o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS, SABBATI, 15° DIE JUNII, 1839.

MISCELLANEOUS PETITIONS.

The following petitions were severally presented, and ordered to lie on the table; namely, —

Education,—By Mr. ESTCOURT and Mr. GREENE, against the proposed scheme, — from Childerditch; Bransgore; Tetbury; and Lancaster.

Railways (Ireland), — Of proprietors and other inhabitants of the province of Connaught, to be included in the proposed measure.

Postage. — For a low uniform rate, — from Auchencairn; and Dalbeattie.

Corn Laws,— From Drumgoon, against repeal.

Church of Scotland, — From Minyhive, against further endowment.

Fisheries (Ireland),— From Killybegs, for placing the fisheries in Ireland on a similar footing with the Scotch fisheries.

EXCHEQUER OF PLEAS BILL.

Read a first time; to be read a second on Tuesday next, and to be printed.

PRINTED PAPERS COMMITTEE.

Second Report brought up, and read.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — I move that this Report be printed, and that it be taken into consideration on Monday next.

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON. — I trust the Report will be printed and circulated without delay. It is important that Members should be furnished with the Report at the earliest possible moment, in order to afford time for consideration before the discussion on Monday. There is another document relative to the proceedings of the committee, which I hope will also be printed and circulated with the Report, — I allude to the minutes of the sitting of yesterday. The committee yesterday discussed the main question, and took a division upon it. I therefore move that the minutes of the sitting of yesterday be read by the clerk at the table.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK.—The minutes to which the Noble Lord refers are not in such a state of preparation as to admit of their being read by the clerk. They will, however, be in the hands of Members on Monday morning.

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON. — Has the Noble Lord any objection to state the names of Members who voted in the majority and minority?

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — It is not usual to read the names of Members who vote in divisions in committees. The minutes are not yet in a state to be read; and I think it would be better not to state a part, when the whole will be in the hands of Members on Monday morning.

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON.—I hope I shall be in order in stating a fact which I think it is of the utmost importance Members should be acquainted with, before entering on the consideration of the Report. In the minority on the division of yesterday will be found the names of the Solicitor General, Lord J. Russell, and Sir R. Peel; these gentlemen having voted against the Report of the majority which has now been presented.

Mr. ALDERMAN COPELAND. — It may look like presumption on the part of so humble an individual as myself to offer any observations upon this important question; but as, in the discussion on Monday I may be prevented from stating my opinions, I cannot allow this opportunity to pass without protesting, in the most decided terms, against that part of the Report which suggests that, in the event of the sheriff entering up the judgment, — that is, in executing the writ of the court, — he shall be committed for contempt. What has the sheriff to do but to obey the orders of the court and to enforce the law? In executing the writ he will be doing nothing more than performing a duty which he is bound to perform. Let Honourable Members ask themselves what the sheriff has to do with the privileges of this House? The judges of the Court of Queen's Bench have laid down the law; and it is the duty of the sheriff to execute it, by carrying into effect the judgment of the court. These are my sentiments; and I must protest, therefore, against a suggestion, which, if carried into effect, can only be considered as an act of tyranny.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — I most anxiously deprecate any further discussion at the present moment; and I cannot but regret the course which has been adopted by the Noble Lord opposite in giving the names of the minority, and not stating at the same time the names of the majority.

LORD VISCOUNT MAHON. — I have asked the Noble Lord to furnish me with the names of the majority.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — I think the course which has been adopted a most inconvenient one. It was hardly fair to state the names of the minority, when it is impossible for the majority to make any reply. The majority cannot be prepared without further deliberation to state their reasons for the vote which they have given, and it would have been better to have waited till the whole matter was regularly before the House. On this day, too, it is manifestly inconvenient to enter upon what can only be a partial discussion of this important question.

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — We are to see the minutes for the first time on Monday morning, and on Monday afternoon to discuss this important subject. I agree with the Noble Lord, that there are inconveniences attending the discussion at present; but I believe it is the first time that a Report has been presented to the House, with a view to its being printed, when it is not yet in a fit situation to be read. Surely we are not to receive that Report simply as a sealed packet. We certainly ought to have as much information on the subject, to prepare for the discussion on Monday, as is consistent with the convenience of the House.

Mr. WARBURTON. — I entirely concur with the Noble Lord the Secretary at War, that it would be extremely inconvenient to discuss so important a question at the present moment. The Honourable Member who has just down has complained of the inconvenience of entering on the discussion of this subject on Monday, on account of the shortness of the time which Members will have for the consideration of the Report; but if there be an inconvenience in discussing the subject on Monday, how much greater must be the inconvenience, if, without having the information before us which the Report conveys, we should at once proceed to debate the recommendations of the committee! I fully acquiesce in the view taken by the Noble Lord the Secretary at War, relative to the minutes of the proceedings of the committee yesterday; and although the Noble Lord opposite has thought proper to state three names of the minority, I shall not be tempted to follow his example, by stating the names of the majority.

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — I deprecate discussion at this time as much as the Honourable Member for Bridport can; but I contend that we have a perfect right to claim all the information which can possibly be given, in order to enable us to come prepared for the discussion.

Report to be taken into consideration upon Monday next; and, with the minutes of the proceedings of the committee, to be printed.

Adjourned at half after three o'clock.

LAY PATRONAGE (IRELAND).

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. — I wish to call the attention of the Noble Viscount opposite to the present state of lay patronage, with reference to certain church livings in Ireland. Under the 6th of Anne, those church livings, in consequence of the nonconformity of Roman Catholics, to whom the patronage originally belonged, were supposed to be preserved and protected for the Crown. Now, within a few days, a curious case has occurred, which induces me thus to direct the notice of the Noble Viscount to the subject. A Noble Friend of mine, a Member of this House, is placed in this situation: — His father was a Roman Catholic, but conformed to the established religion. Having done so, he asserted his claim to the patronage of certain livings in the diocese of Westmeath, and convinced the Government that his claim was a good and valid one. A few days since one of those livings became vacant, and the Lord Lieutenant, on the part of the Crown, presented to it. I think that a just and equitable arrangement should be made, and that the subject should be properly inquired into. I am perfectly certain that it is only necessary to mention the matter to the Noble Viscount, in order to have it fully investigated; for the trust thus vested in the Crown must be considered as a very tender matter — as a matter of honour, indeed. In my opinion, the son, in this case, ought to inherit the right which his father claimed.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — What is the precise object which the Noble Marquess has in view?

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. — My object is to request the Noble Viscount to ascertain the facts of the case. The Crown is bound, by the Act of Parliament to which I have referred, to protect the rights of individuals, and not to usurp them; and I thought that I could not make application on the subject to any one better than to the Prime Minister, in order that parties might not be driven to have recourse to law. I conceive that some inquiry should be instituted; and if my Noble Friend is entitled to these livings, that his claim should be at once acknowledged.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — The subject shall be inquired into.

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. — What is the name of the particular living to which the Noble Viscount refers?

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. — The united livings of Dunsany and Killeen.

UNIVERSAL SUFFRAGE, ANNUAL PARLIAMENTS, AND VOTE BY BALLOT.

EARL STANHOPE. — I beg to give notice, that it is my intention, to-morrow se'nnight, to present to your Lordships several petitions in favour of universal suffrage, annual Parliaments, and vote by ballot; and I shall take that occasion to submit some observations to the House; for, though I cannot fully support those petitions, yet there are considerations and circumstances connected with them which appear to me to deserve, and indeed to demand, the serious attention of your Lordships.

PROCEEDINGS AT THE ELECTION FOR THE COUNTY OF ROSS.

The EARL of HADDINGTON. — With the permission of the Noble and Learned Lord on the woolsack, I will take the liberty of putting a question to him. It will be in the recollection of the House, that in the last Session I brought under the consideration of your Lordships the extraordinary fact, that certain individuals had been appointed justices of the peace in Cromarty, who had been guilty of an act which, in my opinion, disqualified them from sitting on the bench. One of them was an ironmonger, and the other a country practitioner in surgery. These persons were, it seems, guilty of abducting a voter during the election, and thus preventing him from giving his vote. Certainly, it is very unusual and very extraordinary to make justices of the peace of persons who have thus conducted themselves. When I before mentioned the subject, the Noble and Learned Lord said that he would inquire into it. What I now beg leave to ask is, whether the Noble and Learned Lord has made that inquiry? and if so, what is the result?

The LORD CHANCELLOR. — In consequence of the question of the Noble Lord, I did make inquiries on the subject. I found considerable difficulty in ascertaining the facts, but I believe that I did at last ascertain them. The result does not correspond exactly with the impression which seems to have been made on the Noble Earl's mind. It is a long story, and I am not prepared to go into the full statement of the circumstance, if that be what the Noble Earl desires.

The EARL of HADDINGTON. — I have no wish that the Noble and Learned Lord should enter into a long discussion or statement on the subject; but I should, at the same time, be glad if he would state whether he has any doubt that these persons had been guilty of the conduct imputed to them? and whether, if he had known of that conduct at the time, he would have placed them in the commission of the peace? Did not the Noble and Learned Lord find that those two individuals had made a voter drunk at the election for the county of Ross, and in that state removed him, so that he was prevented from voting?

The LORD CHANCELLOR. — The information which I have received forms a long story; and if I tell it at all, I must state it as I received it.

The EARL of HADDINGTON. — The only question is, whether the Noble and Learned Lord found that these persons had been guilty of the abduction of a voter? and whether, if he had known the fact when he made them justices of the peace, he would have taken that step?

The LORD CHANCELLOR. — The fact is, that these three persons met together, and they got drunk together. By degrees, however, they got sober. When the person who was a voter became sober, finding himself in a place where he did not wish to be, he, as might be expected, informed his companions that he was anxious to go back. To this they consented, and all three resolved to return. They, however, went a little out of their way, wishing to see Cawdor Castle. They then met some other friend or friends, and having got a little social again, before they could return they were too late for the election. It was, on inquiry, found that the two parties could not be subjected to any criminal proceeding: that was the opinion of the officers of the Crown, and of the legal adviser of the voter. An action was, however, brought against the parties, and a verdict with 25*l.* damages was returned. It appears that both parties at the election acted with great violence; and I cannot look to the conduct pursued on one side, without taking into account, also, that which was adopted on the other. The result of my inquiry is, that the intention to remove the voter does not seem to have been at all preconcerted. The resolution was formed while they were all three drinking, and was abandoned immediately after they got sober.

The EARL of HADDINGTON. — I am perfectly satisfied with the information the Noble and Learned Lord has given me; and it is for your Lordships to decide whether it was fit and proper that persons who had been guilty of such conduct should be placed in the commission of the peace,—whether it was right that these persons, who made this man drunk for the purpose of preventing him from voting, should be raised to the situation of justices of the peace? The information which I have received on the subject leads me to believe that I am perfectly justified in saying that it was an unfortunate and unfit thing to make such an appointment. If the lord lieutenant of the county was aware of the circumstances, he ought not to have recommended these persons.

The LORD CHANCELLOR. — I never, till now, heard any objection to those persons; and, really, the many and onerous duties of my office preclude me from looking into all the particular details of such cases.

PRINTING OF THE BIBLE IN SCOTLAND.

The EARL of HADDINGTON. — I wish to correct a very great misapprehension that has appeared in several of the public prints, as to an observation which was made by me on a former evening. I asked the Noble Viscount opposite (Viscount Melbourne), whether the plan proposed by the Government, with respect to the printing of the Bible in Scotland, had received the approbation of the Church of Scotland, and I am represented to have said that I wished the plan to be submitted to the bishops of Scotland. I certainly made no such observation, because such a thing as a bishop of Scotland does not exist. What I recommended was, that, before the plan was adopted, the opinion of the Church of Scotland should be ascertained with reference to it.

EDUCATION (IRELAND).

The MARQUESS of LONDONDERRY presented a petition for inquiry, and against the present system, — of inhabitants of the city of Londonderry. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

CLERGY RESERVES LANDS (CANADA).

The BISHOP of EXETER. — Seeing the Noble Secretary for the Colonies in his place, I wish to ask a question, of which I have given the Noble Marquess notice. That question is, whether a Bill, said to have passed the two Legislative Houses in Upper Canada, for re-investing the clergy reserves lands in her Majesty, has reached her Majesty's Government?

The MARQUESS of NORMANBY. —The Bill has arrived; but as no Address has accompanied it, and as the subject of this measure may seem to require an Address, in order to its being laid before the two Houses of Parliament, the matter is now under the consideration of the law officers.

RULES OF PROCEEDINGS (BOROUGH COURTS) BILL.

On moving the second reading of this Bill, —

LORD DENMAN said:—I wish to correct a misstatement that has appeared in the public press, in which I am represented to have attributed to the House of Commons the absurdity of having so altered the former Bill on this subject, as to have rendered it no Bill at all. Now, I stated, very distinctly, that there was a defect in the Bill when it went down to the House of Commons, which was suffered to remain in it, and which, therefore, rendered it necessary to bring in a new measure. This being the case, no necessity existed for considering whether the amendments made by the other House might or might not have been proper. I feel it to be my duty to state this, because I should be sorry to have it supposed that I would say anything disrespectful of the House of Commons.

The Bill was then read a second time and committed to a committee of the whole House to-morrow.

THE MILLION LOAN (IRELAND).

The MARQUESS of WESTMEATH. — I beg to ask the Noble Viscount opposite, what has become of the 100,000*l.* that was deducted from the million loan fund advanced for the relief of the clergy of Ireland? That sum, I am informed, was granted to the Board of Works. I understood, from what passed on a former occasion, that the return on the whole sum would amount to 75 per cent., but I have since learned that it will not amount to more than 25 per cent.

VISCOUNT DUNCANNON. — I cannot give any information on the subject at present, but I will inquire into the matter. I cannot, however, conceive on what ground the Noble Marquess assumes that the return will be only 25 instead of 75 per cent.

CHURCH DISCIPLINE BILL.

The BISHOP of EXETER presented petitions against, — of the clergy of the deanery of Bicester; eastern division of Andover; Newcastle, and archdeaconry of Northumberland; Weldon; and Worcester: and of the Reverend Arthur Tozer Russell, vicar of Caxton, in the diocese of Ely. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

DISSENTERS.

The EARL of DURHAM presented a petition, praying to be immediately relieved from the payment of church rates, and claiming other privileges, — of the deputies from the several congregations of Protestant Dissenters of the three denominations, — Presbyterian, Independent, and Baptist, — in and within twelve miles of London, appointed to protect their civil rights. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

BEER ACT IN PART REPEAL BILL.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE presented a petition against, — of William Miller, of the parish of Walcot, in the city of Bath, retail brewer and beerseller. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

ISLAND OF NEW ZEALAND.

The EARL of DURHAM presented petitions in favour of the measure having for its object the foundation of a British colony there, — of merchants, bankers, manufacturers, and others of Paisley; and Greenock. — Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

BEER ACT IN PART REPEAL BILL.

On moving the third reading of this Bill, —

LORD BROUGHAM said: — I admit that the opposition to this measure has been conducted in a spirit of great fairness; and I think it would save your Lordships' time to take the discussion on the amendments which the Noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) intends to move, now, instead of on the question of the third reading.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — I beg to observe, that it would be an anomaly to have the Bill read a third time, and then that the sense of the House should be taken on the next stage of the question.

LORD BROUGHAM. — Nothing is more usual than such a course.

The MARQUESS of WESTMINSTER. — I shall object at once to the third reading.

LORD BROUGHAM. — Unless your Lordships are prepared to say that the present Beer Bill is absolute perfection, as was once said of our constitution, I hope you will hear the proposed amendments. I will, therefore, now move the third reading; and will reserve any remarks I have to make, until I hear the objections against the measure.

LORD WROTTESLEY. — For my own part, I am anxious to express my opinions with respect to this measure; and, as I had not the opportunity of doing so, either upon the motion for the second reading, or in committee, I cannot help feeling that the present is the most proper occasion for me to address a few observations to your Lordships. The present measure is of great importance. One of the main arguments urged in its support is, that the beer-houses are productive of a greater amount of crime than the licensed houses. I beg to deny that allegation. I cannot find out that the fact is so; and from all the information that I have obtained on the subject, I will say that many of the beer-houses are far more respectably conducted than the licensed houses. The great source of crime is not in the beer-houses, but arises from the want of an efficient police. When I say this, I do not wish at all to see the establishment of a rural police. I would rather see the metropolitan police force enlarged; and then, as the communication by railroads from one part of the kingdom to the other is so rapid, they might always be despatched at a short notice to any district of the country which might be disturbed. Other modes, however, might be suggested of establishing a police force, — I allude to the militia staff. That body of men are now quite useless and ineffective; but I consider that they might be placed under such regulations as to be a means of preventing much crime. They might, in short, be made a most effective corps of police. It often happens, now, that there is only one constable appointed to a district, and therefore there are no efficient means to prevent crime. It appears that there are at present 45,000 beer-shops. Now, I must say that the Bill will operate very unjustly towards these, by throwing the trade open. It is said, that many of the beer-houses have only a few moveables, such as a single table and a few chairs; but I would remind your Lordships, that there are others on which large sums have been expended in building and furniture. Many have been taken on long leases; and in not a few the whole of the little property of individuals is embarked. Some parties, by industry in early life, amass a small property, which they expend on their house; — in fact, they embark their all in beer-shops, as the means of obtaining their subsistence. And the House will recollect, that it is only nine years since that a law was passed, which gave them a vested interest in that description of property, and protected the trade. In that part of the country to which I belong, all the beer-shop keepers brew their own beer; and the expensive apparatus which they have been obliged to procure will be worth little or nothing, if this Bill be allowed to pass. What would the stonemasons who are working under your Lordships' windows say, if their trade were to be abolished, if it were said, "Oh, you will be paid for your tools?" Would they not reply, "That is no recompence to us, if we are to be deprived of the trade by which we support ourselves and families?" Such is the proposition as regards the beer-shops. It is suggested to take away from 45,000 men and their families the means of their own support, and of the payment of their creditors. I do trust, however, that your Lordships, as guardians of the public property, will pause before you consent to pass any Act like the one under consideration.

The MARQUESS of SALISBURY. — It is not my intention to follow the Noble Lord who has just spoken, in his observations about stonemasons, or a rural police; but I would observe, as regards the militia staff not being effective, that the Noble Lord has forgotten to state how it became so. The Noble Lord now at the head of the Government, six or seven years ago, when Secretary for the Home Department, promised to introduce some measure for the purpose of making that staff a police force; but up to the present moment no Bill whatever upon the subject has been brought in. For my own part, I do not regret this; for, as an old colonel of militia, I should not like to be at the beck of the Home Secretary as an inspector of police. With respect to the Bill before the House, I stated my opinion on the introduction of the former Beer Bill, that it would be difficult to prevent its abuse in distant parishes; and though I do not object to an amendment of the present law in several respects, I should not concur in any measure which would have the effect of depriving the poor man of a wholesome beverage, in the place of that pernicious liquor which is almost forced down his throat in many of the licensed houses. I would not put down the present houses; but my amendments will go thus far:—First, I think a most useful step will be, to declare that no new licences for the sale of beer shall henceforward be granted, except by the magistrates. Next, that certificates shall be granted to parties, only, paying a rental of 10*l.*, instead of 6*l.*, as heretofore. The third amendment will be, that the sureties required by the Acts 11th of George IV. and the 1st of William IV., shall be resident in the same parish with the party for whom they become sureties. By this plan, the occupiers of houses of bad character will be unable to obtain any sureties whatever, while respectable houses will still get them. I should be sorry to see the law brought back to what it was before the Beer Bill was established, when the sale of beer was entirely confined to the licensed victuallers. I wish to enable the poor man to obtain his beer, and to discourage the drinking of spirits. My fourth amendment is, that "from and after this time, justices shall be empowered to grant licences for the sale of beer and cider only." Under the existing Act, the moment a magistrates' licence is granted, the party is entitled to a spirit licence from the excise. There is also another amendment which I shall be very happy to move, "That the price of the licence shall be raised,"—which will put an end to all those beer-shops, the occupiers of which have no capital whatever. A man who has to pay for an 8*l.* or 10*l.* licence must expect to sell a considerable quantity of beer to meet that expense. I shall submit these amendments to your Lordships, and should be very happy indeed if you would adopt them; we should then succeed in obtaining some measure; on the contrary, if we pass or reject this Bill, I am confident the present law will continue another Session.

The MARQUESS of WESTMINSTER.—I should like to know what the intentions of the Noble and Learned Lord are?

LORD BROUGHAM.—I wish that my Noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury) should propose his alterations on the third reading; and if those alterations are adopted, then reject the Bill on the motion, "That this Bill do pass." My Noble Friend (the Marquess of Westminster) asks what my plan is? It is to persevere in hearing everything that is to be said on the subject; and if I am convinced that the Bill ought to be rejected, I shall vote against it; but if I be convinced that the Bill ought to pass, I shall vote for it. At present I am, certainly, strongly disposed to press the third reading. I cannot concur in the amendments proposed by the Noble Marquess.

The MARQUESS of WESTMINSTER.—Would the Noble and Learned Lord have any objection to postpone the Bill for ten days or a fortnight?

LORD BROUGHAM.—Oh no! I certainly cannot consent to do that. The delay which has already taken place only appears to increase the Noble Marquess's hostility to the measure. I wish the amendments to be fully discussed and decided upon; and I am also anxious to hear the reasons of my Noble Friend (the Marquess of Westminster) upon the subject.

The MARQUESS of WESTMINSTER.—I understand, then, that the Noble and Learned Lord is determined to persevere with his Bill; in which case, thoroughly convinced, as I am, that it is a most pernicious and cruel measure, harsh and unjust in an especial degree to a class of very deserving persons, I shall propose to your Lordships to say "Not content" to the question for the third reading. A Bill of this kind ought to have originated in the House of Commons. If it be necessary to work a reform in matters of this kind, the Legislature ought to begin with the gin-palaces, then proceed to the public houses, and, finally, as the least mischievous, to deal with the beer-houses. It is said that these beer-shops are established in remote villages, and that scenes of great depravity take place in them, in consequence of their sequestered situation. A little attention, however, on the part of those who are so loud in complaining of such evils, would remove all ground for complaint. Though the brewers are hostile to the measure now in operation,—and I think it a reflection on them that they should be so,—they have derived great benefits from its enactment; for the consumption of malt has been considerably increased since the period at which it passed. With regard to the number of presentments of grand juries which have been made throughout the country against this Bill, of which much has been said, what may your Lordships suppose their number to be? A hundred? Fifty? What may your Lordships imagine were the returns for three years throughout the whole country? It does so happen that the presentments throughout all England, for three years, amount only to twelve! Another return of the cases which were decided in petty sessions, in a population of 14,000 people, shows an average of only 4½ cases in a year; and in the last three years that number has been decreasing. The beer-sellers are only anxious to disprove the assertions of my Noble and Learned Friend, and to prove the truth of what I state. I know that there is great reluctance to hear evidence on such a subject; that your Lordships would not be much disposed to hear such evidence at the bar; but still—it is the best plan with regard to justice. I have had letters from all parts of the kingdom, complaining, extremely, of the way in which the question has been treated by my Noble and Learned Friend. The Noble and Learned Lord's comments have certainly been very strong; but the persons who have written are, generally speaking, more offended at him for undervaluing their property, than for anything else. I certainly, on a former evening, gave my opinion in favour of some further restrictions being added to the Beer Bill; but I have since altered my opinion. I am perfectly satisfied with the law as it stands, as regards the liabilities of beer-shop keepers. With respect to certificates, the parties are obliged to obtain fresh ones every year. Secondly, to give bonds as security for payment of penalties they may incur by violation of the law. For their licences they pay five guineas. In the year 1837, the payments for licences amounted to 132,542*l*. The time they are allowed to keep open is from five in the morning to ten at night. In addition to this, a conviction, upon a charge of offending against the law, works a forfeiture of licence. Therefore I repeat that I am perfectly satisfied with the law as it stands; and, consequently, beg to move that the Bill of my Noble and Learned Friend be read a third time this day six months.

LORD DACRE.—I trust your Lordships will allow me to trespass on your indulgence for a few moments. I think it is of great importance, in so far as the House is bound, by former legislation, to consider the various interests which are involved in this measure. I will state to your Lordships why I differ from the whole of the Bills which have yet been brought forward on this point. The Noble Marquess seems to consider that the present Beer Act is a perfect measure. On that point I shall not dwell, because it has been my misfortune to see a boundless increase of drunkenness, debauchery, and immorality of every description springing from beer-houses. But though I differ from the Noble Marquess in not thinking the Act perfect, yet I scarcely differ less widely from those who advocate the total and absolute repeal of that enactment; and I differ from them, considering the vast amount of capital which is engaged not only in the retail beer trade, but also in the manufacture of beer. One of the great objects anticipated to be gained from the operation of the present law was to raise a competition in the manufacture. The system which that measure was introduced to correct, placed both sellers and buyers too much under the victuallers. It was found that adulteration began with the victuallers; and thus the consumer was obliged to take an inferior, and often pernicious, article, for the same price that he ought to have paid for the genuine one. The remedy for this was the existing Beer Law. The source of many of its evils arises from the facility with which persons can obtain licences. Now, if the number of beer-houses were proportioned and limited to the demand, the evils hence arising would be corrected; and I think that some measure should be adopted for ascertaining the demand, and proportioning the number of beer-houses throughout the country accordingly. It strikes me that the magistrates are not the proper persons to make this estimate of what number of these houses would be sufficient for any given district; it ought to be done by the consumers themselves. I should, therefore, be inclined to propose that no more than a certain number of beer-houses should be established among a certain amount of population; for instance, one beer-house to every 500 persons, or, what is the same thing, for every hundred heads of families. Certificates might be called for from the ratepayers for the purpose of insuring the character and good conduct of the keepers of the houses. In that case we should have no instances of persons going to keep beer-houses at the remote corners of lonely heaths, when they must look for their livelihood to the custom of considerable numbers of persons. I think the amendments of the Noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury) objectionable, inasmuch as they do not meet the evil at all. The alteration of system which I have indicated would, on the contrary, meet the evil, at the same time that it would not interfere with the due supply of the wants of the poor,—for wants, I maintain, they are, and they ought to be considered and provided for. "But," say some persons, "let these houses be governed by the same regulations as the licensed victuallers." This, however, would be most unjust; for the objects of the victualling house and the beer-house are totally different: the one is intended for the accommodation of travellers, and therefore must be kept open to a late hour; the other is for the reception of the labouring classes,—tippling houses they would have been called in old English,—and, though there is no need for keeping them open to such late hours, yet I will say that the poor ought to have a place where they may get a wholesome beverage, and enjoy the warmth of a good fire, after a cold day's work in winter. For these reasons I feel inclined to vote against all the amendments.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH.—I cannot but observe that the House of Commons, for some time past,—and certainly not less so, since the Reform Act,—have shown a disinclination, to receive very favourably, Bills which are sent down to them from your Lordships' House: the House of Commons appear not to desire that your Lordships should take the initiative in any measure. Hence I think it is not improbable that this Bill may be rejected there. Whether or not the Bill is an interference with the privileges of the Commons, I will not take upon myself to say. I am told that, strictly speaking, it is not; but it may, and very likely will, be so represented to the House of Commons; and therefore the Bill may be at once rejected. Any amendments and improvements which any of your Lordships may feel inclined to make, ought to be made as speedily as may be convenient, since your Lordships may not have another opportunity for this purpose. With regard to the measure itself, I confess I think that my Noble and Learned Friend opposite (Lord Brougham) is somewhat too hasty; he is proceeding too rapidly in putting an end at once to the present Beer Act. But then, on the other hand, I cannot agree with all the amendments which have been suggested. It would be better, it is said, to have a more efficient system of police. I do not think that any such measure could be efficient in a case of this kind. There may be riotous conduct exhibited in some of these houses occasionally; but to this I do not feel disposed to attach a very great degree of importance. It is not the riots in beer-houses, but the resort thither, that are ruinous to the morals of the peasantry. Every comfort which attends them, there, is bought at the expense of the comforts of their wives and families. If the labourer goes to the beer-shop daily, he must spend, there, more than the price of his firing, and more than half the amount of his rent. It is the resort, therefore, that is ruinous. No police measure will do. But I beg to submit to your Lordships, whether you will read this Bill a third time and pass it, together with the amendments of the Noble Marquess (the Marquess of Salisbury)? for those amendments, in fact, constitute an entirely new Bill.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

The Noble Marquess's Bill is a Bill of regulation; my Noble and Learned Friend's Bill is a Bill of enactment. Under these circumstances, if your Lordships are not disposed to adopt the measure and the amendments at once, I believe the proper course would be to recommit the Bill, which would give time and opportunity for consideration. Before I conclude, I must beg to observe that I think it remarkable that the Noble Viscount opposite has not yet stated what are the intentions of Government on this subject. The Noble Viscount, indeed, said that he could hardly believe that my Noble and Learned Friend was serious in bringing in a measure for the alteration of the Beer Law; but that was stated of the former measure, not of this. I will say, that this question is one of immense importance to the morals and happiness of the people; and the Government are bound to form an opinion upon it, and to express that opinion when called upon.

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE.—I have felt much pleasure in listening to the speech of the Noble Baron. I concur in almost every word of what has fallen from my Noble Friend on this occasion. I feel, very much, the great, the paramount importance of this question; I feel that I cannot look to the great body of evidence which has been drawn together in relation to it,—I cannot consider the generally expressed opinion of the people, represented, as it is, by the voice of such respectable bodies, who have had the best means of obtaining information, and who possess abundant experience on the subject,—without my being compelled to admit the evils of the present measure — to admit, indeed, the failure of the present measure. I am compelled to agree that there are great evils attaching to the existing law; but I cannot believe that its enactment and operation have changed the whole morals of the country — made a quite different scene of the whole land — and altered, as it were, the whole nature of man. As to those who use such language, it is enthusiasm which carries them away. At any rate, it is impossible for me to think that so great a difference exists between the operation of the small victualling houses upon the morals of the people, and that of the beer-houses; I cannot think that the step between being licensed by the excise and being licensed by the magistrates can be so different. Licensing houses for the sale of spirits are, I believe, a matter of ancient regulation; but your Lordships ought to remember that, after all you can do, after a long experience of the working of the system, there are still evils arising out of it. After all you can do, there ever will occur scenes of disorder in such places. This arises from the nature of the case. Crimes ever will be planned and brought to maturity in these places; but that is because they are places of meeting, not because liquor is sold there. Where are thieves to meet? They must meet somewhere to concert their plans; and the most convenient places are houses of this description: there they go, ostensibly for other purposes, where their real intentions cannot be questioned. Do what your Lordships will, legislate as you will, these things, in those places, will always subsist; no changes which may be made can alter the nature of the system; but, in my opinion, it would be a nugatory act, on your Lordships' part, if your Lordships were to pass the Bill of my Noble and Learned Friend. Indeed, my Noble and Learned Friend proposed it, apparently, without much confidence in its success, and in a faltering manner.

LORD BROUGHAM. — No, no!

VISCOUNT MELBOURNE. — Yes; my Noble and Learned Friend certainly spoke without confidence of the ultimate success of the Bill; my Noble and Learned Friend said, "We will send this Bill down to the other House; but if they find anything to add which will make it more effectual, we will be very glad to receive it at their hands; but, as it is, I don't place much reliance upon the measure." This Bill, I am disposed to think, deals in too rough and hasty a manner with property. Your Lordships may remember that you dealt very roughly with property when you passed the original Beer Bill; because, by adopting the system of beer-houses, you greatly deteriorated the value of the public houses of the licensed victuallers, on which great sums had been laid out; you deteriorated property of this kind to a very considerable extent. Noble Lords who are conversant with the country, know this well. Your Lordships lately conferred a great boon on the trade by taking off the beer duty; and now you are asked to interfere with the property which was invested under the arrangements then made, without giving any equivalent advantage to the trade. The number of the beer-sellers is about 45,000, that of the licensed victuallers 55,000: the amount of revenue received for the licences of the beer-sellers was 183,000*l.* in 1837; the amount arising from those of the licensed victuallers, for the same year, was 91,000*l.* The quantity of malt for which duty is paid has incredibly increased under the present system; but that result, I admit, is chiefly to be ascribed to the reduction of the duty, and the growth of the population and consumption of the country. The number of victuallers occupying houses rated under 12*l.* appears, by the Return, to be 18,878; that of beer-sellers is 15,515, — which, I apprehend, considering the relative numbers of the different classes, places them much upon a par. The number of beer-sellers brewing their own beer, in 1837, was 16,800. As to the penalties for the adulteration of beer, there have been fewer convictions among the beer-sellers, I understand, than among the licensed victuallers. On the whole, it appears to me that it would be very unwise and imprudent to pass this Bill, which I think a rash and hasty measure. There is a great deal, also, in what has been said by the Noble Lord opposite, with respect to the impolicy of originating this Bill in your Lordships' House. I do not wish to say much on this subject; but I apprehend there can be no possible doubt that this is a Bill which, if sent down to the House of Commons, cannot pass; and I appeal to your Lordships to pronounce whether, under these circumstances, it would be wise and prudent to send it there? There is another reason why I think your Lordships should not send it to the other House. From all that I can learn, — and I have spoken with persons who have made careful inquiry, — there is not one man in the House of Commons in favour of it. From all I can understand, there is no reformer of beer in that House, who is for going all the lengths of this Bill; and therefore no very sanguine hopes of its success, there, can be entertained. This is, altogether, a subject of the greatest importance, which well deserves the care and attention of Parliament, upon which your Lordships should well consider what steps should be taken, and whether you ought not to apply to it uniform legislation. The real point of the question, which has been touched upon by several Noble Lords, is this; — whatever rules you establish, unless there be the means of enforcing them, they will, to a certainty, be totally idle and useless. The Noble and Learned Lord has well shown, in his speech on the second reading of the Bill, that it is vain to complain of laws or magistrates, if there do not exist sufficient means to put those laws into execution. Your Lordships may depend on it that the real cure for the evils of disorder and irregularity in the administration of such laws as the Beer Law, is — to arm the magistracy with greater power for enforcing their due observance. Depend upon it, that until this is done, not all the laws you can pass in this House will be of any service. It is not necessary to have so large a machinery for that purpose as is generally thought to be required; the measure would not involve such great expense. It has been well observed that, for a long period, very little alteration has taken place in the constabulary. It is true, that that force has become inadequate to the necessities of the present times. A very few men in the country, who are really to be relied on — firm, and resolved to do their duty, — can do a great deal in carrying the law into effect. It does not require so great an expense, or so large an establishment, as is supposed to be necessary, to put the constabulary force upon an efficient footing. Very strange prejudices are afloat upon this subject; — it is supposed to be connected with the liberty and constitution of the country. I never could understand what connection there could be between liberty, and licentiousness — between liberty and impunity for crime. I have always thought that liberty is best secured by a regular and firm administration of the law; and in my conscience I consider that that is one of the great objects to which the attention of Parliament and the country should be directed. But it does not appear to me that it would be wise or prudent, even for the objects your Lordships have in view, to pass this Bill.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I never heard a speech, from any person, which betokened so entire and dark an ignorance of every part of the subject to which it related, as that which has been just delivered by my Noble Friend near me. My Noble Friend has told your Lordships that there can be no possible difference between the behaviour of a man licensed by the magistrates, and that of a man licensed by the excise. What ignorance is here! Why, there must be all the difference in the world. A mere name seems to have the power of taking in my Learned Friend — I beg pardon, my Noble Friend. God knows, I cannot call him learned, — at least on this subject; — well, then, my Noble and "ignorant" Friend. The magistrate gives this licence during good behaviour; and if the good behaviour ceases, the licence ceases also. The only condition of retaining the excise licence, on the contrary, is the payment of 3*l*. This has the effect of making the public houses well conducted, and the beer-houses ill conducted. My Noble Friend near me (Viscount Melbourne) says, that the difficulty your Lordships have to contend with is, that the law, as it at present stands, is unavailing for the purposes of keeping those houses in order, and that some police regulation is necessary to effect this object. This may be all very true, and no doubt is so; but it does not justify hostility to this Bill. For what is this Bill? Why, nothing more than merely reducing the law, in relation to licensed houses, to that state in which it formerly stood. This is exactly what it proposes — nothing more nor less. I am sorry to see, from the aspect of the House, that the present critical hour has had the effect of sadly thinning your Lordships' numbers. Your Lordships like the Beer Bill little, but you like remaining in the House after half past seven o'clock, still less. Your Lordships like to see a good state of morality in the country; the tranquil order of society you dearly love — it is the very apple of your eye; but there is another affection operating upon certain delicate organs in the constitution of Noble Lords, still more intimately than on those connected with the peace, order, and purity of society, and reminding them of what has been called the most important event of existence — that of dinner. But my observation is not confined to the lay Lords; it extends equally to those who are the appointed guardians of public morals and virtue. How often have I heard the beer-houses denounced by the Right Reverend occupants of that bench! There is hardly a bishop whom I have not heard imploring your Lordships, from that very place, "for God's sake, to apply a remedy to that which makes all our preaching and teaching vain — to reform those nests of drunkenness — to remove those moral plagues." And now that I come forward at their instigation, — now that I lend myself as their coadjutor, — now that I put myself, as an humble instrument, in the hands of the guardians of morality and religion, — but two out of six-and-twenty Right Reverend Prelates will sacrifice their dinner,—their regard to their belly, which is their God.

The MARQUESS of SALISBURY. —I rise to order. I move that the Noble and Learned Lord's words be taken down.

LORD BROUGHAM. — That they may be taken down correctly, I think I had better repeat them. I was saying that the bench of bishops ——

LORD KENYON. — I rise to order. The moment the words are objected to, no time should be lost in taking them down.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I am just repeating them, that the clerk may be at no loss. The bench of bishops, more than all the lay peers of the realm, have expressed their strong sense of the evil effects of beer-houses on the moral habits of the people under their care, and it is chiefly at their instigation that I have brought forward a measure as their coadjutor, and an humble instrument in their hands, for the purpose of putting down what they abominate as prejudicial to the morals of the people ——

The MARQUESS of SALISBURY. — Those were not the words.

LORD BROUGHAM. — Allow me to finish the sentence; I am getting on. But I find that the whole twenty-six prelates ——

LORD KENYON. — I rise again to order. A Noble Friend of mine has called the Noble and Learned Lord to order, and he must state the reasons why he did call him to order.

LORD BROUGHAM. — The words must first be taken down.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — In point of fact, the opportunity has now passed. It is the strict rule of the House, from which there is no departing, that, when words used by a Noble Lord are objected to, they shall be taken down before any other speech or proceeding has taken place. This rule has not been adhered to in the present case; other observations have been made since those complained of were uttered, and therefore they cannot now be taken down.

The EARL of WINCHILSEA. — The Noble and Learned Lord, having no wish to shelter himself, is, as I understand, about to repeat the expressions which he used; and then, of course, they may be taken down.

The MARQUESS of SALISBURY. — I hope the Noble and Learned Lord will at least explain his meaning?

LORD BROUGHAM. — I have no objection to state my words. I said that the bench of bishops, at whose instigation I have brought forward this measure, and in whose hands I have been an humble tool, out of their great regard for the morals of the people, had sacrificed all personal considerations, and had attended by two of their body upon the present occasion; and, having the greatest veneration for the bench of bishops, I felt peculiar pain that no more of them were here. That is all I meant. My Noble Friend opposite (the Marquess of Salisbury), with that generous ardour which distinguishes natives of the Principality from the Saxons, hastened to interrupt me. My Noble Friend, perhaps, thought two quite enough of the bishops, and did not care so much about them; but I would fain have had the whole of the twenty-six here. I will now proceed to the arguments urged in reference to this Bill, and from the consideration of which I was diverted by the interruption just experienced. I have heard nothing whatever advanced against the measure now before the House that would justify me in giving it up. I have not taken up this question prematurely. I only brought it forward when I found that it had neither been taken up by the Government nor by any Member of your Lordships' House, — the feeling being general that some one ought to introduce a measure on this subject. The Noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Wellington) is of opinion — and to any opinion coming from such a quarter I always pay due respect — that a measure on this subject ought to emanate from the House of Commons. Well, I waited month after month — not day after day — to find whether any one would bring forward a Bill on the subject in the other House of Parliament. A Noble Friend of mine in that House gave notice of his intention to introduce such a Bill; and, in consequence of this notice, I postponed the consideration of the measure now before your Lordships. It, however, turned out that the original measure, of which notice had been given in the other House of Parliament, went off, and another was introduced, but which was entirely unlike that originally proposed, and, to my mind, quite ineffectual to meet the evils which were so generally complained of. Well, then, if such be the facts of the case, — if it appear that the House of Commons either cannot or will not bring forward such a measure as would be calculated to put down the grievance which is so seriously felt, — if that House neglect its duty in this particular, — is that a reason why your Lordships should neglect yours? As to the statement that the Beer Bill is not complained of by the country, I can only say that all lawyers are against it; and I know, full well, that all judges are opposed to it. Therefore it is, I now bring my proposition forward for getting rid of the evil complained of. If the House of Commons reject it, it will be a satisfaction to me to know that I have done my duty. Much has been said about my Bill interfering with the capital which has been embarked in the beer trade, and in the utensils employed in the manufacture of beer. I am sure that the magistrates, in granting licences, will attend to these things, and see that neither capital nor utensils are overlooked, when parties come to them to be licensed. There is nothing in this Bill that prevents magistrates from granting licences to every one of the 45,000 persons who are now selling beer, if they wish it. This Bill is not to put down beer-houses, — it is merely to place them under the control of the magistrates. I wish to give to the magistrates the same authority over beer-houses which they now possess over public houses; and, if your Lordships assent to a Bill giving this power, you may depend upon it the result will be, that the good beer-houses will be retained, and the bad ones got rid of; and, when this is done, care will also be taken that, where capital has been employed, either in utensils or any other way, the persons who have so employed it will have their cases specially attended to. Upon the whole, I have only to observe, that, in bringing this measure under your Lordships' consideration, I have merely done my duty. My wish is to see the habits and morals of the poor improved; and it is because I believe that an alteration of the Beer Act would materially tend to effect this object, that I bring forward this measure, to which I have been urged by your Lordships, — urged by the Right Reverend Bench of Bishops, who have given their pious testimony in reference to the evils of the present system, — to which I have been urged by the judges of the land, — to which I have been urged by the country gentlemen, by the magistrates of the country, and by (I need hardly say) the licensed victuallers of the country. I, however, have done my duty. Hereafter, I wash my hands of the measure, if it do not pass this night. However your Lordships may act with respect to it, I have the satisfaction of knowing that I have done my duty. It has been frequently urged, when objections have been taken to the working of the Beer Act, that your Lordships ought to give it a fair trial. Well, you have done so year after year, and still the evils of the measure become more and more apparent. My Noble Friend who has opposed this Bill asked whether the grand juries of the country had made presentments against the operations of the Beer Act? Had these presentments been to the extent of thousands, or even of hundreds? No, says my Noble Friend, the number of presentments has dwindled down to the magnificent quantum of twelve. But is it nothing, that those twelve presentments come from twelve different counties in England, all of which complain that these beer-houses are nuisances, — that they tend to increase crime, and to produce immorality amongst the labouring classes? It remains for me only to say, that, if this Bill do not pass, I shall, for the future, leave the matter in your Lordships' hands. I hope the Government will then take it up, — that they will make it an open question; but, whether the Government do so or not, this I will state at once, — that, if the Bill do not now succeed, I shall not further persist in it. I am, however, sanguine that it will succeed this night; but, whatever may be its fate, I now sit down, leaving it in your Lordships' hands to deal with it as you please.

The DUKE of WELLINGTON. — On the occasion of the second reading of this Bill, I stated that I had voted three or four times for other Bills, of which the object had been to amend the present system of beer laws; but the friends of that system had always had power in the House of Commons to defeat all measures for that object. Your Lordships are, therefore, at last brought to this stage, in which you are under the necessity of having recourse to a Bill which repeals all the existing system of beer laws. When the Noble and Learned Lord opened this measure to your Lordships, he stated what was perfectly true, — that there was considerable capital invested in different parts of the country; and he further said, that his object was to propose an Act which would give security to that capital. Indeed, the original principle of the measure, which allowed the sale of beer on the premises, but did not permit it to be drunk there, would have given security to that capital; but the Bill, which was sent to a select committee, came out of it without the clauses introduced for that purpose by the Noble Lord, and therefore without any security for capital. I should be glad to see this measure coupled with some such sort of proposition as has been made by my Noble Friend below me. I think that that object might be accomplished either by recommitting the Bill with a view to amending it, or else by taking certain clauses of it into consideration after the third reading shall have passed. I am of opinion that, if the latter course were adopted, your Lordships would be more likely to come to an agreement on my Noble Friend's amendments, and to render the Bill more like that which was originally introduced by the Noble and Learned Lord opposite. I confess that there is one proposition of my Noble Friend which appears to me well worthy of consideration; and that is, to enable the magistrates to license these beer-houses. The Noble Viscount, however, cannot see the difference between a beer-house licensed by the excise and a beer-house licensed by the magistrates. Now there is, as stated by the Noble and Learned Lord opposite, a very material difference between them. The licence of the excise goes on for ever; but the licence of the magistrates must be renewed periodically, and will not be renewed unless the man who keeps the beer-house conduct himself as the magistrates think that he ought to do. In conclusion, I will only state my opinion that, in passing this Bill with the amendments proposed by my Noble Friend, your Lordships will be more likely to meet the wishes of the other House of Parliament, and so to achieve that good which we all have in view.

The BISHOP of CHICHESTER. — I rise to repel the most uncharitable and unchristian attack that has been made upon the bench of bishops.

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — If the Right Reverend Prelate wishes for peace, he is not taking the best means to procure it.

The MARQUESS of SALISBURY. — I am sure that the Noble and Learned Lord will withdraw the expression which has given such offence to the Right Reverend Prelate.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I have given, as I think, a satisfactory explanation of what I have already stated. If, however, the Right Reverend Prelate is anxious to enter into debate, I am quite ready to repeat my expressions.

The BISHOP of CHICHESTER. — I am the last person in the world to place myself in this position with your Lordships, but if ——

LORD BROUGHAM. — I have nothing more to say, my Lords. Go on, go on!

LORD KENYON. — I rise to order. It is with great regret that I interrupt any of your Lordships who sit on the bench of bishops: but I am sure that if the Right Reverend Prelate will only turn his mind to the practical results which must arise from his present course of observation, he will see that they cannot tend to the preservation of order; for it is a rule, never, I believe, departed from in this House, that when a Noble Lord retracts an expression, he should be considered as not having made use of it. It is, therefore, not competent for the Right Reverend Prelate to pursue the strain of reflections on which he appears to be entering.

The BISHOP of CHICHESTER.—As far as I, myself, am concerned, I only meant to say that the Right Reverend Prelates, whose absence this night has been impugned, have been employed, one and all, for five or six hours this day in committee upon the Church Building Bill, and also upon the Church Discipline Bill. I know that not one of them had dined at seven o'clock; and I believe that they have, all of them, been engaged this day from nine o'clock in the morning on public business.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I do not wish any person to stand in the way of the castigation which the Right Reverend Prelate seems inclined to bestow on me. This, however, I must say, — if the Right Reverend Prelates have been employed in committees all day, so, too, have the laity; and I, myself, had no more dined at eight o'clock this day than the Right Reverend Prelates dined at seven. No expression that I used was so disorderly as that which dropped from the Right Reverend Prelate. I only quoted from Milton.

LORD PORTMAN. — I think the best course for your Lordships to pursue is, to vote for the third reading of my Noble and Learned Friend's Bill, and thus have a plain and straightforward mode of proceeding. I believe your Lordships will do a better service, as regards the object which you have in view, — which is to get some positive enactment in order to put an end to the evil that at present exists, — by supporting the Bill now before your Lordships, than by consenting to recommit it for further consideration. If this House show to the country, and to the other House of Parliament, that it is prepared to go the full length of this measure, you will have a proposition sent from that House, of a nature more likely to meet the concurrence of your Lordships than any which has yet been made. Of all the suggestions that can be offered on this subject, those of the Noble Marquess are, in my opinion, the most objectionable. Were your Lordships to agree to them, I am convinced that you would never hear of beer-shops being abolished. With regard to the Bill of my Noble and Learned Friend, — although it will not, I am sure, be as effectual as he thinks it will, — I repeat that the best course for this House to adopt is to give it a third reading. I am sure, as between the question of a committal and the third reading, there cannot be a shadow of doubt that the latter is the proper course to take.

EARL DELAWARR. — I beg to express my humble thanks to the Noble and Learned Lord opposite — if he will choose to accept them — for his exertions towards remedying the crying grievances which now exist with regard to beer-shops; and, however much I may regret to oppose the amendments of my Noble Friend (the Marquess of Salisbury), I feel bound to support the Bill as it now stands.

The House then divided; when there appeared —

The EARL of CHICHESTER. — As regards the question before the House, I need only say that I should be sorry to see all kinds of beer-shops abolished. I also think it would be inexpedient to supply their place by an increased number of public houses, where spirits would be sold. The evils now complained of would, I believe, be best corrected by retaining a certain number of beer-shops, and placing them under stricter regulations, — under the direction of the local magistrates. With the view of making provision to that effect, I beg to move that the Bill be recommitted.

LORD BROUGHAM. — I apprehend there will be some objection, in point of form, to recommit a Bill which has been read a third time.

The MARQUESS of SALISBURY. — The Bill has not yet been read a third time; and therefore it is quite competent to my Noble Friend to move the recommittal.

Question, "That the Bill be recommitted for Monday next," resolved in the affirmative. Bill recommitted accordingly, and the Lords summoned.

CHURCH RATES.

Mr. F. KELLY. — Before the Order of the Day is read, I wish to ask the Noble Lord the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether it is the intention of her Majesty's Government to bring forward any measure during the present Session for the settlement of church rates? I put this question to the Noble Lord so far back as April last; and at that period the Noble Lord replied that he should be able to give an answer to the question in a week or ten days; but from that time to the present I have not heard whether any steps are to be taken for that purpose, or not.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — Had the Honourable Member renewed his question at the time he alludes to, I should not have had any hesitation in stating that no Bill will be proposed during the present Session for the settlement of church rates.

PRIVILEGE — STOCKDALE v. HANSARD.

Order for considering Second Report of Select Committee (the 15th of June) read; Report again read.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—Not having been one of the majority of the Committee on Printed Papers, by whom this Report was agreed to, I feel obliged to say that, if any proposition is to be made to the House on behalf, and as representing the opinion, of the majority of that committee, I am perfectly ready to allow that proposition to be first made, as what I have to submit to the House can be proposed afterwards. At the same time, I am perfectly prepared, at present, to state what is the course which the House, in my opinion, ought to adopt.

Mr. WYNN. — Whatever may be the course which the House shall ultimately adopt, I apprehend that it would be most fitting, in the first place, that her Majesty's Ministers, who have proposed the appointment of this committee, and who have hitherto moved in all the steps which have been taken by the House in this business, should explain to us the course which they now propose that the House should pursue. It is for the Government to propose a plan, and for the House to determine how far they will act in pursuance of it.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I have already stated that I am perfectly ready to explain to the House what is the course which I think the House should now pursue. At the same time, I must remind Honourable Members that the question before them relates to the privileges and powers of the House of Commons, as the House of Commons; — and does not in any way relate to the conduct of the Government, as a Government. I feel it necessary, that, under present circumstances, some course of proceeding should be proposed without any further lapse of time, because, to-morrow, a very important step will be taken in the proceedings in the action, with respect to which the House has already taken certain measures. If I did not feel it to be so necessary that some permanent decision should be come to by the House, I should rather refrain from submitting any measure or resolution of my own, and leave it to those who have more deeply studied the question of privilege, to propose what they would, no doubt, recommend with greater fertility of argument and with greater weight of authority. But as some important step must be taken, and as the House, to whom the Report of the committee is now known, must come to a decision whether or not they will take any further steps with respect to the proceedings in the action which has been brought against the printer to the House, I shall propose certain resolutions to the House; and before I proceed further, I shall put the House in possession of them. The first resolution I shall propose is, — "That it is the opinion of this House, that, under the special circumstances of the case of Stockdale v. Hansard, it is not expedient to adopt any proceedings for the purpose of staying the execution of the judgment." And the second is this: — "That this House, considering the power of publishing such of its reports, votes, and proceedings, as it shall deem necessary or conducive to the public interests, an essential incident to its constitutional functions, will enter into the consideration of such measures as it may be advisable to take, in consequence of the recent judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, for the maintenance and protection of that power, so soon as the committee shall have made that full and complete report on this important matter, which they have declared it to be their intention to make in the commencement of their Second Report."

I shall now state, as shortly as I can, the reasons why, as I think, we ought to come to this practical conclusion, without entering upon the larger and graver question which the House will have to consider upon receiving the full and complete Report, or in the case of any fresh proceedings against the printer of this House. When I propose to the House the resolution, that under the special circumstances of the case it is not expedient to take any further proceeding for the purpose of staying the execution of the writ, I am bound to state that my own impression is, that nothing which has occurred in consequence of the resolution of the House, recommending the House to plead to the action, has put it out of the power of the House to take instant and immediate proceedings to stop the execution of the writ. The argument in that behalf was stated very clearly and very ably in the committee by an Honourable and Learned Member, who has placed his opinions upon record, in the form of an amendment to the Report. This was also the opinion of many Members of the House belonging to the profession of the law, who had considered the case before the House had determined to direct the Attorney General to plead in the case of Stockdale v. Hansard — of many Members of that profession on both sides of the House, who informed me, and informed the House also, that such was their view of the matter. This was the course which was likewise taken in a case which I consider very much stronger than the present, — in the action brought against the Speaker by Sir F. Burdett, when Mr. Ponsonby stated his opinion — that the Speaker ought to plead in that action, although the attorney was committed. This was the course which the Government accordingly took, recommended, as it was, by Mr. Ponsonby, whom I consider of very high authority on such a question. All that has been done by the House in the present matter is, — to inform the Court of Queen's Bench that this is considered by the House of Commons as a question involving the privileges of the House of Commons, — a power which they hold to be essential to the due performance of their functions; and they therefore plead their privilege in order to bring before the Court of Queen's Bench the fact that the House of Commons do so consider it. I think that to proceed thus does not prevent the House of Commons from doing anything they may think proper after the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench. But there is another, and a totally different question, — whether the House of Commons, being perfectly competent to stay the execution of the writ, shall actually do so? The first question is, whether it would be consistent with justice to do so? I own, I cannot persuade myself that it would be. The House of Commons have brought the question under the consideration of the judges, and the judges have deemed themselves bound not to consider merely the information which they received from the House of Commons upon the subject of their privileges, but to consider whether they were legally precluded from giving judgment in this case, just as they would give judgment in any other case which should come regularly before them. Right or wrong, the judges have decided that the defence which has been made is not sufficient, and they accordingly have given their judgment for the plaintiff. After that, damages were assessed under the direction of the sheriff, and assessed at 100*l*. Now, the sheriff, who has to execute that judgment, has merely to consider whether or not he has received legal and sufficient authority to induce him to execute the writ. He is not the party who instituted the action; he is not the solicitor who brought it forward; neither is he the counsel who appeared on the part of the plaintiff, nor the judge who decided against the privileges of the House of Commons. He is only the executive officer, who, in the usual and legal course, will have to execute the writ and levy the damages. It seems to me, then, that to pass by the plaintiff, his solicitor and counsel, and the court which gave the judgment, but to visit with punishment the sheriff who has to execute the writ, would be against all those notions of justice which all men, learned or unlearned, entertain on such a subject.

I must say, therefore, with respect to this action, — not merely allowing, but asserting, that the House of Commons was right in instructing the Attorney General to plead in it, — that, in the present stage of the proceedings, after judgment has been given, it would not be consistent with justice to order the sheriff not to proceed with the execution of the writ, with the view of committing him to custody if he should disobey such order. Sir, when I say that such a course is not consistent with justice, I think I have already said that it would not be consistent with expediency. If we were to proceed in this question in a manner which would be thought by the people of this country in general, as it appears to me, to be inconsistent with justice, there could be no higher degree of inexpediency — there could be no more decisive evidence of inexpediency — than the idea that such a decision would not have justice in its wake. I will not, therefore, enlarge upon the impression that might be produced, or upon the feelings that might be created, by a proceeding, on the part of the House of Commons, which would excite general repugnance and dissent. It is sufficient for me to state that I think those feelings of repugnance and of dissent would be naturally excited; and therefore I have come to the conclusion that it is not expedient in this case to adopt any proceeding for the purpose of staying the execution of the writ. I think that the House is not debarred, if there should be a case of absolute necessity; but as I do not consider that the sheriff is the person on whom the punishment ought to fall, it would be highly inexpedient to take that course.

Having said thus much in support of the first resolution, I will state, with regard to the second, that I think it necessary to make some few remarks in favour of the resolution to which the House has already come, and the substance of which is stated in the Report, — namely, that the House shall have the power of publishing such of its votes and proceedings as it shall deem necessary or conducive to the public interests; and which power is stated to be necessarily incident to its constitutional rights and privileges. Now, what I conceive that you have done is this; — an action was commenced in the Court of Queen's Bench; but you did not think it proper, without further knowledge, both on the part of the public and on the part of the judges, to order the commitment of any persons who were parties to that proceeding. You decided that the Attorney General should appear and state that the House of Commons considered this was a function and a power necessarily belonging to them; and it appears to me that, in so proceeding, while you did not give up the rights of the House, it acted with great temper and moderation. You might have taken a less moderate and more violent course; but it appears to me that the House acted rightly in submitting to the judges the grounds on which they thought that no action could be maintained. My Honourable and Learned Friend the Attorney General stated, with very great ability, with very great learning, and with very great judgment, all the points which it was incumbent on him to press on the attention of the court. I will not enter into a consideration of the precedents which my Honourable and Learned Friend quoted on that occasion; but I think it necessary to say a few words as to the nature of the decision which has been come to by the judges upon this question. My Honourable and Learned Friend the Attorney General stated to the House, immediately after the judgment was pronounced, the general effect and substance of the opinion of the judges. That statement was impugned at the time; but from what I have read since of the opinions of the judges, I must say, that it not only confirms the general accuracy of my Honourable and Learned Friend's opinion, but has also confirmed me in the idea that, right as the House of Commons may have been in not proceeding to any violent or extreme measures till they had first submitted, by pleading, their case to the judges, yet that the judges, however conscientiously they might decide the question, and however great might be the learning displayed by them, are not the fit judges of the privileges of the House of Commons. It is not wonderful that this should be so; it is consonant with the whole of our history, — it is consonant with the course of examples without number, — that the judges, however eminent they may be in their own places, and however eminent in the discharge of the functions which they have to perform, are not, and ought not to be, the supreme judges of the powers and the privileges of the House of Commons. These are matters which are not of a nature to come under their usual consideration, and to attract their daily and ordinary attention, and on which it is obvious that they must come to a narrow and a very exclusive decision. Sir, I shall take the liberty of reading some passages from the judgments of some of the judges in support of the opinion which I have given; and I would not have done so unless the statement of my Honourable and Learned Friend had been impugned the other evening, and consequently, this general statement of my own had become equally liable to contradiction in this House. The case before the court arose out of the reports of the inspectors of prisons; and it was the opinion of Lord Denman that the statement of the inspectors of prisons had nothing to do with the proceedings of the House. Let it be observed, too, that this was not a legal opinion, arising on any legal question. The Lord Chief Justice of the Court of Queen's Bench has thus spoken, in his judgment, of the proceedings of the House of Commons: —

> It is likewise fit to remark, that the defamatory matter has no bearing on any question in Parliament, or that could arise there. Whether the book found in the possession of a prisoner in Newgate was obscene or decent, could have no influence in determining how prisons could best be regulated; still less could the irrelevant issue — whether it was published by the plaintiff.

I would now beg to call the attention of the House to this question in particular. It might have happened that matters were ready for the consideration of the House, of which no present notice was taken; but it occurred that, on this question in particular, not only might the opinion of Parliament be fitly pronounced, but more than once they have been called upon to do so. Three years ago, in 1836, as I think, or in 1837, a Bill for the regulation of prisons was introduced into the House of Lords. It passed that House; it was then sent to this House. The Bill, in general, met with the approval of the House; but one exception was taken to it. It was said, by many Members in this House, that the prison of Newgate was exceedingly well managed; that there were few or no abuses in it, and that there was little that required regulation; and I was threatened with the loss of the Bill if I did not exempt the prison of Newgate from its operation. The exception in favour of this prison seemed to me to be unreasonable. An inquiry in the House of Lords showed that the prison was not so free from irregularity as had been said, and I declined to exempt Newgate from the Bill. Only let us conceive, then, a person,—I will not say an excellent judge, but only conceive a judge—saying, that any question as to the prison of Newgate had nothing to do with legislation, when the very question was, whether Newgate was so well regulated as to preclude the necessity of inspection? The next year a committee sat on the regulation of prisons; and the first question considered was, whether it was not possible to propose better means of regulating Newgate? and whether it was not possible to build a new prison?—and the committee reported in favour of such a resolution: and am I to be told that the regulations in force in Newgate are matters which could not properly come before the House of Commons? When the House considered the question as to the possibility of substituting any better course of prison discipline, it was important that the House should know what the inspectors of prisons, authorised by the Legislature, said as to the prison visitors, as to the gaolers, and, though on a minor subject, still on an important one, as to what books were introduced. This matter forms a part, a small part if you will, but still a part, of the general system of prison discipline. The judge said, also, that if the ascertainment of these facts "by the House was a thing indifferent, still less would the publication of them to the world answer any one parliamentary purpose." When the prison inspectors reported that the management of Newgate was very loose, that obscene books were introduced there, to the contamination of the youthful prisoners, it was surely just and proper that the court of aldermen, and those who had the management of that prison, should be made acquainted with that Report, that they might contradict its accuracy, if they could. Yet it would seem, according to the learned judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, that any Member of this House, who, when the Report was printed, should have communicated it to the court of aldermen, or any person not a Member of this House, would have been guilty of publishing defamatory matter, and subjected to the most vexatious, expensive, and harassing proceedings. Another learned judge was also of opinion that, though Members ought to have their papers, they ought not to communicate them to other persons; and Lord Denman observed,—

> The reasoning is, if you permit the number of copies to be as large as the number of Members, the secret will not be confined to them; and this affords a strong appeal to justice and expediency against printing, even for the use of the Members, what may escape from their hands to the injury of others.

So that the bias of the learned Chief Judge's mind was, that if any doubt existed on the subject, that doubt would induce him to decide against the power of printing even for the use of Members. The judgment of another learned judge (Mr. Justice Patteson) extended to a great length over the whole question. In the course of it, he observed,—

> It is said, that if papers, however defamatory, must needs be printed for the use of the Members, as it is plain they must, and the point is not disputed, their further circulation cannot be avoided; for what is to be done with the copies upon a dissolution of Parliament, or upon the death or retirement of a Member? The answer is obvious; the copy of such defamatory matter ought to be destroyed.

This shows, that even to the court of aldermen the learned judge would not allow the Report to be communicated. Now, only imagine the House of Commons reduced to such a position as that each of its Members should be obliged to destroy his copies of all parliamentary papers on the dissolution of Parliament, or his retirement from the House. I would put this question: the Right Honourable and Learned Member for the Tower Hamlets, at the commencement of the Session, retired from Parliament, on his acceptance of the judgeship of the Admiralty Court. According to the views of Mr. Justice Patteson, the first thing the Right Honourable and Learned Judge should have done, on resigning his seat, would have been to go into his library and destroy all copies of such of his parliamentary papers as might contain what could be considered defamatory matter. This statement of the learned judge shows the House that, whatever course we may think fit to adopt, whatever may be the result of the advice of the committee, it is quite impossible we can acquiesce in this opinion of the learned judge. I do not see, for instance, — and this point does not appear to have at all occurred to the judges, — I do not see, for instance, how the House could entertain any complaint respecting the conduct of a person holding office, or in the situation of a judge, or proceed to any Address for the removal of such person, if they were not able to communicate to any party, even to the party accused, copies of the complaint made against him. There is an infinity of cases which could be put forward as illustrations to show that the House cannot admit this interpretation of the learned judge. Put the case of the proceedings in a question in which the Honourable Member for Oxford took such interest, — the slave trade, — and the conduct of the Government respecting that trade as carried on under the flag of Portugal. According to the court of law, if the Honourable Member moved for copies of the despatches which had passed on this subject between the Government of this country and the Government of Portugal, and these were produced, it would be perfectly competent in the Government of Portugal to go to the Court of Queen's Bench, and say that these despatches were, in some part of their contents, a libel, either against the Government, or against some captain of a vessel, or against the Queen of Portugal in general, and proceed to an action. And how, again, would the Government of this country be able to defend themselves in reference to any proceedings they might advise her Majesty to adopt on the subject of Portugal, if they were not able to communicate to the country what the case was as regarded the Portuguese slave trade? But, then, the question, as stated by Mr. Justice Patteson, comes to this, — whether or not the House of Commons or the Court of Queen's Bench is to decide ultimately and absolutely with respect to the privileges of the House? Mr. Justice Patteson argues that it is the Court of Queen's Bench which is to make inquiries and decide on the points; and, indeed, as the Attorney General has observed, not only the Court of Queen's Bench, but any court of quarter sessions, or borough court, or any other inferior tribunal, might make inquiries and decide upon these points, according to the opinion of the learned judge. I am ready to admit that it is quite possible for the House of Commons to exceed the due and proper powers vested in it — and necessarily vested in it — for the performance of its duties. Indeed, Mr. Justice Coleridge has put this extreme case, — that the House of Commons might order capital execution to be done on a person convicted of petty larceny. This, certainly, is a very extreme case; and, if the putting such extreme cases had anything to do with the real bearing of the question, it would be very easy, also, to suppose an extreme case on the part of the court, though it would be difficult to come near that suggested by the learned judge. But the House must bear in mind that, if the judges are to have the power of defining the privileges of the House, they may not only prevent any new privileges being asserted, but they may, also, restrict the ancient privileges of the House, and deprive us of all our powers; — for that tribunal in which is vested the power of explaining, interpreting, limiting, and restricting the privileges of the House, will, also, have the power of settling what those privileges should be. I can imagine the case of some Honourable Member making a speech in the House against one of the learned judges in England, Scotland, or Ireland, and asking the House to proceed to an Address against him. If the case were brought before the Court of Queen's Bench, it might be argued in answer, that the party who had made the speech in the House of Commons was not answerable for it, as it was spoken in the House of Commons. Upon this the judge might say, upon the newly declared principle, — I am only following the example of a learned judge in putting an extreme case, — the judge might say, "It is true that Members have the power of saying what they please in their own court of Parliament; but when the House has once admitted strangers to be present at their debates, — when they have declared their opinions, in the presence of strangers, in particular cases, or against particular persons, — this is a communication to strangers, a publication to the world; the opinion becomes a slander, and an action for slander will lie against the person making the speech, — not because he has pronounced it as a Member of the House, but because he has so pronounced it in presence of several persons sitting in the gallery, and therefore virtually published it." Such a judgment, given by the Court of Queen's Bench, would not amount to near so extreme a case as that which has been acted upon, in order to deprive this House of its ancient and essential privileges. There is no case so extreme, so absurd, so improbable, that might not be imagined for the purpose of affording grounds for taking away any power vested in the House of Commons, the House of Lords, or the Crown. The Crown has the clear right of declaring war against all the powers of Europe to-morrow, if it think fit; but would any one make that very improbable contingency a ground for demanding that the Crown, should be deprived of its right to declare war? It would be utterly preposterous and unjust to talk of depriving the Crown, or either House of Parliament, of its due and essential and constitutional powers, because it is possible to conceive a case in which these powers might be improperly exercised. I repeat my admission, that the House may possibly exceed its powers; but I can see no means of its maintaining its authority, its dignity, its independence, except by reserving to itself, entire and intact, the power of declaring what are its due and constitutional privileges; and by taking care that such a declaration on its part shall be held final and sufficient throughout the empire. Sir, with respect to the manner in which these powers are to be best asserted, to the way in which the House can best proceed in this difficult case, I do not propose to give any opinion whatever on the present occasion. The House has seen that their committee, having considered this matter very anxiously, is extremely embarrassed as to the course to be pursued. I found that even Gentlemen on the committee, the most conversant with the subject, and the most competent to give an opinion on it, — the Attorney General, among others, — had great doubts as to the course to be adopted; and I think it better to abstain, myself, from offering any suggestion on the point. All I can do, on this occasion, is, to declare my conviction that, although the present may not be a fit occasion for its exercise, yet that the maintenance of our power to print our own votes and proceedings is essential to us, and must not, in the slightest degree, be abandoned, if the House wish to preserve its efficiency and its authority.

On the first resolution being read, —

DOCTOR LUSHINGTON said: — Sir, I was desirous of waiting until some other Member had addressed the House on this resolution, before I offered a few remarks upon it. Now, Sir, I was not a member of the committee to whom the consideration of this question was originally proposed; but I had the honour afterwards to be named on the committee which lately sat, whose Report the House is now considering; and I feel bound to come forward, under the existing circumstances, not to oppose the resolution of my Noble Friend, but to support and maintain the opinion which, after much consideration, I took the liberty of stating in that committee. There was great deal in the speech of my Noble Friend to which I can give my acquiescence. I concur in his opinion, that this is a privilege indispensable to be maintained by the House of Commons, — without which it would be utterly impossible for the House honestly to discharge its duties to its constituents. But after hearing this privilege so ably maintained, and the various parts of the judgment so ably animadverted on, by the Noble Lord, I must confess I look upon the conclusion to which the Noble Lord has come, as little short of an abandonment of the privileges of the House. This is a question of vital importance to the interests of the people at large. It is not a question of personal privilege. It is not a question of privilege from arrest, — a privilege affecting ourselves, personally, or our property; but it is a question of a privilege, without the exercise of which we could never satisfactorily perform our inquisitorial duties, — expose the abuses which might, from time to time, exist in the administration of justice, — give satisfaction to our constituents, — or do justice to the people of this country. Let the House look at the circumstances of this case; let us reflect what a case we have abandoned; and then let us ask ourselves how, on a future occasion, — differing as it might in all essential particulars from the present case, — how, if we now submissively humble ourselves before the judges, we could have the slightest prospect of success in asserting that privilege which we have almost unanimously voted to be essential to the House? How bold is the House in conclusions! how courageous in recording its opinions! how weak — how vacillating — how imbecile — in acting upon them! How did this question come before the House? — How did it originate? — In any extraordinary exertion of the rights of the House, — in carrying its power to its extremest bounds, — or in the performance of one of its first, its greatest, its most sacred functions? It originated in an inquiry into the gaols of the country, — an inquiry into those dens, which, within my own memory, were not merely full of abuse, cruelty, and injustice, but the fostering haunts of crime and contamination. In the prosecution of that great and most just inquiry, inspectors were sent into these gaols, whose Reports were ordered to be laid on the table of the House. These Reports were laid on the table of the House; and from them it appeared that in a prison — not in a distant part of the country, where there were slight inspections, where there was little inquiry as to whether abuses existed in them, or not, but — in a prison in the heart of the metropolis, within two miles of the House of Commons, within the city of London, and under the management of a body who have lately shown themselves so excessively jealous of their own privileges, there were found the abomination of abominations, — a prison half filled with youth of both sexes, in which the most obscene, demoralising, and disgusting books were allowed freely to circulate. And who is the plaintiff in this case? — A man whose character had been unjustly slandered, — who was smarting under the injustice of a publication, without having the opportunity of vindicating himself and his property before the world, as might happen in the case of a man against whom a petition had been presented, containing particular charges? No such thing: the plaintiff is the very publisher of these horrible publications, the very author of the crime, the very individual who sent forth these obscene publications! This is the man who comes forward, and brings an action impugning the privileges of the House! There never was a more groundless action. It would be utterly impossible for ingenuity to imagine a case which presented less grounds for an action, — impossible so to combine together circumstances as to form a case which should present to the mind greater iniquity in the offence. I say, that if you ever intend to support the privileges of this House, now is the time to make the stand. It has been said that the House would be taking an unpopular course in contravening the judgment of the court of law, — that the people of England would stand by the court of justice in insulting the House of Commons. I tell the House that the people of England would do no such thing. As I said in the committee, I repeat now, and from the bottom of my heart, — Go to the people of England, and tell them this; go to the poor parents — to the poor widow, with children dependent on her, and under her control, herself with scarcely the means of supporting them — tell her that should these children become the victims of accusation, they will be shut up in a prison, where such contamination as these books will surround them. Does the House suppose that the people of England would not have all their feelings aroused against this? They would reflect that the innocent as well as the guilty are inmates of this gaol. What says the Noble Lord? His opinion is, that it would be unjust to proceed in this matter now. If it be unjust, the question would be at an end; but I deny that it is so. How did the case arise? The Attorney General proposed a course which was followed. I shall not trouble the House with any legal argument on the subject; but I will maintain this; — that all that has been done by pleading in that action did not admit the jurisdiction or concede the right of the Court of Queen's Bench to try the action; but merely informed the Court of Queen's Bench, in the most authoritative form and in the most respectful manner, that this was an act of the House of Commons, — that it was done by their order, — and that they demanded that the proceedings should be put an end to. The resolution which the House came to passed unanimously ——

[Cries of "No, no!"]

At any rate, there was no division upon it

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

Well, then; this House having acted with such forbearance, having acted in strict conformity with former proceedings, and the Court of Queen's Bench having thought fit to disregard the communication from the House of Commons so authoritatively made, — is it consistent with propriety, with the maintenance of its just rights, that the House should now abstain from further proceedings in the matter? The Noble Lord talks of injustice. To whom would injustice be done? The Noble Lord said — to the sheriff. But no one proposed to commit the sheriff. What is proposed is, to give notice to the sheriff, in the name of the House of Commons, that if he proceed to execute the writ, he will be guilty of contempt. It has been said, that it is the duty of the sheriff to execute the writ; I will assert that it is not. It is his duty to obey the House of Commons. The House of Commons is the judge of its own privileges; and if we abandon any of those privileges, it will be impossible for us efficiently to perform our duty to the country. Assuming that the sheriff had obeyed the order of the House, and any proceeding were taken against him in consequence, then it would be the bounden duty of the House to uphold him, and to commit to the custody of the sergeant-at-arms any individual, be he who he might, who had ventured to outrage the House by contravening its orders. Has the House become so impotent that it cannot, and so pusillanimous that it dares not, defend itself from aggression? If so, it had better at once formally abandon all its nominal privileges: you have no alternative, for your privileges are at an end. My Noble Friend has declared that it is inexpedient to proceed any further. I am sorry to hear him thus establish, for ever, a precedent for this House submissively prostrating itself at the feet of the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench. After giving this precedent of entire acquiescence in the dicta of those judges, — after having thus strengthened the case against ourselves, and in spite of the resolution we have put on the Journals, — the House is, when the Report comes, to set about devising some plan which shall have the effect of preventing the recurrence of this breach of its privileges. I cannot conceive it possible that, in any Report which can be made by the committee, any means can be suggested to the consideration of the House, for replacing the House in the position in which it now stands, — namely, with the power and full right, at the very first moment a court of law declines to acknowledge its authority, to go fairly and, in the face of the country, unflinchingly assert and maintain its privileges in the most distinct and unequivocal manner. I may be asked what practical course I should propose. Had I the slightest prospect of obtaining any extensive support, — any hope of being able, by a motion, to maintain the privileges of the House as they ought to be maintained, — humble individual as I am, I would not shrink from the responsibility, if no other member of the committee entertaining similar opinions were to come forward for the purpose of proposing a resolution.

[Cries of "Move, move!"]

But no: Diis aliter visum; and after the opinion which the Noble Lord, so justly looked up to by his party, has given, it would be absurd, not to say impertinent, on my part, to attempt to force a motion of my own on the House. I would only observe, in conclusion, that the evils depicted by the Noble Lord as imminent, if we abandon this privilege, are nothing compared with the reality of those which must in that case follow.

SIR R. INGLIS. — Sir, in the whole course of my parliamentary experience, I have never heard a speech, the conclusion of which was in such entire contradiction to the rest of it, as that of the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman who has just sat down. It was a speech, able, eloquent, and worthy of the talents of the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman, — worthy of everything — except its conclusion. Now, that, after seeing his way so clearly all along, the Right Honourable Gentleman should have arrived at such a termination, is to me very surprising. The Right Honourable Gentleman, after a most tremendous series of flourishes, stopped short, and turned directly round. The House is placed in a most difficult position; but the result will be, apparently, that after eating more leek than ever ancient Pistol did, you will come round to what I advised you to do in 1837. The Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman who has just sat down, while he declared himself practically of the same opinion as the Noble Lord, suggested that the course open to the House was, not to summon the sheriff to the bar of the House after having executed the writ of the Court of Queen's Bench, but to warn him — to give him notice — that if he executed the writ, he would contravene the judgment and directions of this House; in fact, that he would be guilty of a violation of its privileges. Suppose this done, what next would the House do? The sheriff, by the duties of his office, is bound to execute the orders of the superior court: in fact, although I cannot speak as a lawyer to the point, I feel no doubt whatever, that a party having obtained a writ of execution against another has some means of calling on the law to enable him to obtain the amount of damages assessed. If so, it is impossible to suppose that a person so situated would hesitate twenty-four hours as to the course he should take, — that he would be content to have his verdict practically reversed, and himself to be deprived of his money, instead of being a gainer by the result of the action. Supposing, then, the sheriff to refuse to do his duty, — would not, before twenty-four hours had elapsed, some means be found to call on him, or on some other person, to execute the law in the case? Are you prepared, in that event, to seize the judges, the Lord Chief Justice of England — himself a Peer? In the face of the House and of the country I call on the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman, and those who think with him, not to fly at the inferior birds, but seize the eagle at once. Let him try to bring the Lord Chief Justice to the bar of the House. No man has more moral courage, I dare say, than my Right Honourable Friend; but I would venture to suggest, that if he brought the people of England into a contest in defence of the law, some physical courage also would be required. If we are prepared to bring the highest judge in the country — the Lord Chief Justice himself — to the bar of this House, then, but not till then, let us attempt to seize the sheriff. But it is neither to vindicate the character of the House, nor to exhibit either moral or physical courage, to attack the subordinate and allow the superior to go free: therefore I think the course indicated by the Right Honourable and Learned Gentlemen is sheer folly.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

Who is it that has despised our privileges? Is it the sheriff? — the jury? — the counsel in the cause? — the attorneys? No; the expositors of the law, themselves, if I have rightly read those proceedings, — are the parties who set at nought the assumed privileges of this House. The jury was merely called on to assess damages by order of the higher tribunal. My Noble Friend quoted a passage from the recorded opinion of the judges in a way calculated to convey a very imperfect view of those opinions. In the first place he quoted a passage from the judgment of Mr. Justice Patteson, which excited much observation and unfounded ridicule both in the House and out of it. At the time that learned judge delivered that judgment, there was sitting near him a Noble Lord, who was, himself, in some measure, a party in the case, which related to a predecessor of his in the office which he then held. The case quoted by Mr. Justice Patteson had reference to the question, what were and what were not privileged communications. The learned judge's words were —

In the case of Fairman v. Ivis, 5 Barnewall and Alderson, 642., a petition addressed by the creditor of an officer in the army to Lord Palmerston, the Secretary at War, was held not to be actionable, although containing defamatory matter; but can it be doubted, that if Lord Palmerston had ordered it to be published, the publisher would have been liable to an action? or can it be contended that the Secretary of State, to whom the report and reply on which this action is brought, were, by Act of Parliament, directed to be sent, to be by him laid before the Parliament, would have been justified in publishing them? And, if not, why should the House of Commons be at liberty to do so? In the same manner, the protection of all confidential communications extends no further than the necessity each particular case requires.

I contended, on a former occasion, that where the communications were for the use of Members, they were privileged; but that, where they were for the use of others, they were not privileged. No one now, however, attempts to set up a distinction between distribution and sale. I have, myself, no hesitation in admitting, that I now think I was quite wrong on the occasion in question. But the conclusion to which I came was the same, — that we are not at liberty to publish, by sale or distribution, matter that is libellous. Half the argument, in this question, rests on the difference between what is to be held as libellous, and what is held to be privileged, as information necessary for public purposes. Why, there is scarcely one case in twenty in which there is not something which a fastidious person might pronounce libellous. Could not more care be used in the mode in which the necessary information is prepared for publication? In many committees which I have attended, letters of the alphabet have been used to designate particular names, where the matter was of a libellous nature. In the Police Committee, particularly, I remember this to have been done. By this means, all that was necessary to be known to the world was given, but injury to individuals was averted by the suppression of the names. In the present instance, the name of the author of the book in question was suppressed. Why, if the House, by so doing, admitted that they perceived a difficulty, did they not suppress the name of the publisher also? The whole difficulty has arisen from the reckless carelessness with which the matter has been prepared for the printer. Having got into the scrape, however, — the simplest word is the most appropriate to designate the dilemma, — the only question is, how best to get out of it? The proposition on which I had originally intended to take the sense of the House, but which I shall now read, merely, that it may be recorded, is one which, in substance, meets the views of the Noble Lord. On one point, however, I differ from the conclusion of the Noble Lord. The Noble Lord, having abandoned the great and leading proposition, — namely, the right of this House to resist the law, — appears to comfort himself with the hope that he may keep the proposition in petto, as it were, until some future occasion, when the dignity of the House may be asserted with more effect. That comfort, I think, is for ever denied to the Noble Lord, after the speech of the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman. I am not here to defend the character of the individual whose proceedings have given rise to the question; that is not necessary to the merits of the question; and, in fact, it was never raised in the course of these proceedings, except incidentally and illogically, when observations were made in which I could not concur: but I maintain that all the information required might have been given, and yet no injury have been done to any individual. The practical object might have been as safely and effectually attained, if the name of the publisher, as well as of the author, had been suppressed. What will be the result of the Noble Lord's proposition? The judges will be left in the same position. Another similar case might occur in the course of next week. It is said, however, a subsequent opportunity may be taken by the House to affirm their privileges. That must be either by resolution or by Bill, to become an Act of Parliament. If by resolution, is it not clear that those who set at nought one resolution would set at nought another? If by Bill, it must be either a declaratory Bill or an enabling Bill. If a declaratory Bill, then the House must proceed to declare that to be the law, which the highest legal tribunal has already declared not to be law, — a decision in which the House has practically concurred, by neglecting to avail itself of the right of appeal. For the Learned Attorney General will surely not assert that he has exhausted all the means of obtaining a judgment that were open to him. There has been no writ of error. Why? Because the Learned Attorney General was afraid of the result. A declaratory Bill will, therefore, surely not be resorted to. Will you then proceed by an enabling Bill? How could the power of this House to claim, or of the other to concede, be limited? When a Bill is introduced to "enable" this House to exercise certain privileges, we must exercise them under the control of another body. Now, Sir, I will not enter into the question which body is the more popular, or the more deserving; but this I will say, — that it would be as unconstitutional for this House to yield to the House of Lords in a matter relating to our own privileges, as to yield to the learned judges themselves. What, then, are we to do in this case? No man can feel more, than I do, the difficulties in which the House is placed, nor desire more earnestly and singly to put an end to them; because I admit, to the fullest extent, the principle, that the privileges of this House are not for individual Members, but for the benefit of the people whom we represent. That which was, before, theory, has now become fact; that which had been thought a mere legal supposition, has now been decided by the Court of Queen's Bench. The course of the House, then, is clear. If you cannot evade or resist that decision by any process, known either to yourselves or to the constitution, your first duty, as good subjects, is to obey the law; and to declare, not in the terms of the Report of the committee, but in terms contrary to it, that the House is not prepared to resist the execution of the law. I was prepared to submit such a resolution to the House, though not to press it to a division, unless I found that course approved of by those in whom I generally place confidence. The resolution I would have been prepared to move was, "That the House having directed the Attorney General to appear on behalf of Hansard and Sons, in an action against them for the publication of certain papers, alleged to contain libellous matter upon John Joseph Stockdale, which papers the House had directed them to publish, and the Attorney General having accordingly appeared on their behalf in the Court of Queen's Bench, and argued the question of law which arose on demurrer to the plea of the defendant, — namely, the right of the Court of Queen's Bench to inquire into the power of the House to direct such publication without subjecting the defendants to any liability thereby, — and judgment having passed against the said defendants by the decision of the judges of the said court, and the ordinary appeal against such judgment not having been adopted, and damages having been assessed against against Hansard and Sons by the jury, and the same being about to be levied forthwith; — that this House do not resist such execution of the law." This, I admit, is a yielding of the case, — but not more so than the proposition of the Noble Lord himself. I venture to say that it states the question in a more straightforward manner. Sir, I beg leave to move the amendment.

The amendment having been put, —

SIR R. INGLIS said: — Sir, having been asked on both sides not to press the amendment to a division, I have moved it merely for the purpose of having it recorded. With the permission of the House, I will now withdraw it.

Mr. WARBURTON. — Sir, under any other circumstances, it would be great presumption in me to trouble the House;

but when I heard the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman (Dr. Lushington) so warmly and so eloquently argue the case, and express opinions in which so many Honourable Members concurred, namely,—that these proceedings were neither more nor less than a high contempt of Parliament,—I thought he would at least have concluded his speech with some resolution which would have enabled those who concurred with him, whether in a majority or minority, to put on record their sentiments on the matter. As he has not done so, however, I am prepared to give those Honourable Gentlemen, who may concur with me in opinion, an opportunity to put that opinion on record. The amendment which I would propose, is a paragraph taken from the excellent draught of the Report presented to the House by the Honourable and Learned Member for Newark, who has acted a straightforward and manly part on this question, because the opinions he has expressed, he is prepared to maintain. How great a contrast does his conduct afford to that of other Honourable Gentlemen, who were so loud on former occasions in the maintenance of their opinions, and in professing their readiness to show that those who had adopted the course which gave rise to these discussions had been guilty of a contempt of the privileges of Parliament! The resolution which I beg to propose to the House is as follows: — "That acquiescence in the judgment pronounced in this case will create, on the part of the House, a great impediment in the future necessary exercise of parliamentary authority in vindication of their privileges; and that it is therefore necessary that the House should forthwith declare, that the further prosecution of the said action, and the attempt to levy any damages on the defendants for a publication, in pursuance of the orders of the House, directly impedes the exercise of their parliamentary functions, and is a high contempt of the privileges of this House; and that this House will visit with severe displeasure all officers, ministers, and others, who may act or aid, in any manner, in enforcing the judgment on that matter, or in troubling or molesting the said defendants for such publication; and that a copy of this resolution be served on the sheriff." I would merely say a very few words in support of this resolution. I desire to remind the House of the many instances in which this House, in the exercise of its inquisitorial functions, has published matters which, according to the authority now set up, must be deemed libellous. One instance I would particularly refer to, which occurred only a Session ago. I allude to that case in which a magistrate for the county of Kent was charged with having induced thirty or forty persons, for a sum of 4s. or 5s. each, to put their names down as subscribers to a railroad scheme for thousands, when those parties were shown to be persons of no means. Now, was or was not that a fit case for the investigation of Parliament? Was it a case, the circumstances of which ought to have been confined within the walls of Parliament? or one which ought to have gone forth to the public, so that others, prone to resort to the same course, might be warned of it? A similar investigation took place with regard to five or six other subscription lists. The investigations were of no use whatever, unless the names of the individuals, proved insolvent, yet subscribing their names for thousands, were given to the public. Yet I might, as a publisher of those libels, — for I gave away plenty,—have been called on to appear by the Court of Queen's Bench as a libeller. To talk of our exercising these inquisitorial functions without being able to make the result of them public, is trifling with the House. But I am not going to argue the question. It is a res acta, — a matter on which the House has already decided; and all that the Honourable and Learned Member for Newark calls on the House to do is, to stand by its own resolutions. The Noble Lord calls on us to be prudent now, and valiant hereafter. This is to suppose that the House can choose its ground as well in some similar instance — to suppose that some new Mr. Stockdale will bring his action for libel while the House is sitting, and that the House will therefore have the opportunity of commencing its resistance ab initio. Suppose, on the other hand, that the plaintiff — this present Mr. Stockdale, if you will — commence his action during the long vacation, proceed in it with the greatest activity, and push on to judgment before the House again meets, so that execution shall be either actually levied, or on the very point of being levied; — what, in such case, becomes of your threat to visit the court with your displeasure? The same appeal to your compassion, on the part of the sheriff, would again be made; the House would be told it was too late to commit him, and to dispute any of the proceedings; and, therefore, it would again be recommended that judgment should be allowed to go by default, and execution levied; and again we should be told that the next case should be one on which we should no longer be cowed.

Sir, I beg pardon of the House for attempting to argue this case in the presence of so many who are far better qualified to do so; and now, for the purpose of giving an opportunity to my friends of placing their votes on record, I beg leave to move the resolution which I have just read to the House.

Mr. HUME. — Sir, there is no Member of this House more interested in the question than I am; for, since I have sat in Parliament, no man has brought forward more cases of abuse, in which evidence was elicited which might be considered libellous. I am of opinion, that the powers of the House, as the grand inquest of the nation, would be destroyed, if it delayed to do those acts of justice which the interests of the nation might require. We might as well shut the doors of the House — (which, by the way, many might wish us to do) — as give up a privilege, by the exercise of which so much good has been done, and is yet likely to be done, to the country. I am very anxious to hear the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth deliver his sentiments on the present question; for I cannot but bear in mind the very argumentative speech which that Right Honourable Gentleman made, on a former occasion, in defence of this privilege, which he is now, in conjunction with the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department, as I infer, about to give up, in — the Right Honourable Baronet and the Noble Lord must allow me to say — a most dastardly manner. The House will, however, no doubt, hear from the Right Honourable Gentleman the reasons why he has changed his opinions on this question. If I remember rightly, the Right Honourable Baronet, on the occasion alluded to, recommended the committal of the individual: for consistency's sake, therefore, I hope the Right Honourable Baronet will state his reasons. The course taken by the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman who has spoken so strongly on the one side, while he appears to be about to vote on the other, has also struck me with much surprise. After having so ably demolished the argument of the Noble Lord, I expected nothing less from the Right Honourable Gentleman than a demolition of his motion also. But a more tame, timid, and milk-and-water conclusion I have never heard. I expected that, at least, the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman would have moved an amendment, affirming the privileges of the House. According to the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, — should the House acquiesce in it, — if, hereafter, a witness, for refusing to give evidence, or any other cause, should be committed to Newgate, the Court of Queen's Bench will have the power to pronounce upon the exercise of its privileges by this House. Every court in the kingdom has the power of maintaining its own privileges; and surely the House of Commons — the highest of all — should have the same power, or the evil effects to the interests of the people will be most serious. I beg leave, Sir, to second the amendment of my Honourable Friend.

SIR R. PEEL. — Sir, if even I had not been appealed to, so directly as I have been by the Honourable Gentleman who spoke last, it was certainly my intention to have expressed my opinion upon this important question before this debate should close; because, whatever other Honourable Members may do, I certainly do not shrink from maintaining the same opinion as I have given in the committee. I advised the committee to the best of my power; and I am not at all disposed to exhibit that sensitive apprehensiveness for the stability of my opinion, that other Honourable Members have evinced. The Honourable Gentleman calls upon me to vindicate my consistency in now supporting the resolution of the Noble Lord, and yet having, on a former occasion, advised a different course. Now, I will endeavour to show that the mode of procedure which I advise in the present instance is precisely in conformity with the course which I advised upon the occasion referred to. The committee of 1837 had come to the following resolutions: —

That, by the law and privilege of Parliament, this House has the sole and exclusive jurisdiction to determine upon the existence and extent of its privileges; and that the institution or prosecution of any action, suit, or other proceeding for the purpose of bringing them into discussion or decision before any court or tribunal elsewhere than in Parliament, is a high breach of such privilege, and renders all parties concerned therein amenable to its just displeasure, and to the punishment consequent thereon. That for any court or tribunal to assume to decide upon matters of privilege inconsistent with the determination of either House of Parliament thereon, is contrary to the law of Parliament, and is a breach and contempt of the privileges of Parliament.

A few days afterwards, the question was raised in the House, whether the Attorney General should be permitted to plead to that action? What was the opinion delivered by me upon that occasion?

Mr. HUME. — Hear, hear!

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — The Honourable Gentleman cries "Hear, hear!" What, then, he is already so satisfied with my explanation of the consistency of the course I have pursued, that he wishes to stop me short. Now here are the opinions I expressed on that occasion: —

Mr. Speaker, I have not heard without great regret the opinion of the Attorney General, that it is advisable, on account of the technical and legal difficulties which would accompany any other course of proceeding, to direct the servants of this House to plead to the actions that have been brought against them. I had hoped that this House possessed sufficient power to vindicate, by its own exclusive authority, without the aid or recognition of any extrinsic jurisdiction, those privileges which are absolutely essential to the performance of its proper functions, and even to its existence as an independent branch of the Legislature. I am aware of the precedent for pleading furnished by the case of "Burdett v. Abbott;" but as the result of the proceedings in that case was a distinct confirmation, by the highest judicial authority, of the exclusive right in the House of Commons to judge and decide in matters of privilege, I had hoped that that precedent rather supplied a reason for the assumption by the House of Commons of the jurisdiction which it admitted to exist, than a rule for a repetition of the course which was then followed.

That was the opinion I expressed at the commencement of my speech, and at the close I find the following remarks: —

I trust the sanguine anticipations of the Attorney General — that, upon fuller and more deliberate argument, the court will reverse this decision — will be confirmed. Still, I cannot view without serious apprehension the possibility of their disappointment. By the course recommended by the Attorney General, — that is, by the instruction of our officers to plead, — we virtually submit a decision upon our privileges to a court, the head of which has already given an adverse decision with regard to them. If that decision be confirmed, our next step will be an appeal to the House of Lords; and thus the transfer, to a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature, of that exclusive jurisdiction to which we lay claim as a matter of privilege. I have every confidence that justice will be done according to the law and constitution of the country; but, believing that the privilege to which we lay claim is as unquestionable as it is vital and essential to the proper discharge of our functions, I cannot, without anxiety, see it made the subject of litigation.

Sir, upon that occasion, several Honourable Members expressed a difference of opinion from me. The Noble Lord opposite also disagreed with me in opinion, and held that, although we might permit our officers to plead, it was competent to us afterwards to resist. That was an opinion in which I could not concur; and, amongst the rest, I was supported by the high authority of the Honourable Gentleman who spoke last, who, with that force of expression which I should in vain endeavour to imitate, concluded his speech in a tone the most complimentary to the House; for he described the whole affair as "an attempt to drag them through the mud in a very unpleasant manner."

[Laughter.]

Now, the Honourable Member having just, I suppose, escaped from the mud, shakes his locks at me, and gives utterance to this charge of inconsistency. Again, the Honourable and Learned Member for Newark, who drew up an able Report, and who has been a most consistent supporter of the view that he took of the subject, said, —

To revert, however, to the question, — what would be the position of the House if the plea were overruled? My opinion is, that the House would be placed in a situation of the greatest difficulty. If the Attorney General appear in the case, and argue the matter on the part of the House, undoubtedly it would be something like a submission. All the courts are bound to acknowledge the privileges of that House; but if the case were argued before the Court of King's Bench, the court might determine against the House. I would recommend the Attorney General, therefore, not to argue the question, but to submit it to the court, and ask for judgment. If the court pronounce judgment against the resolution, then this House should take up its proper ground, and Honourable Members who will not stand boldly forward in defence of their privileges cannot stand up for any other. Honourable Members should be enabled to leave to their successors the privileges which they, themselves, have a right to enjoy.

Now, I am of opinion that it would have been infinitely better if we had acted on the resolution, and committed the first person who had infringed the privilege of this House. Another course that we could have pursued was, that which has been defended by my Honourable Friend the Member for Oxford University, and other Honourable Gentlemen. The third course was that recommended by the Honourable and Learned the Attorney General, and which was followed. We did plead, or we allowed our officer to plead; and all the points of that plea have been overruled by the court, and the decision has been against us. As to all the technicalities of pleas and demurrers and rejoinders and surrejoinders, I shall not enter upon them, but I shall listen with most respectful attention to arguments founded upon them by Honourable and Learned Members, although, as a non-professional man, I fear I may have considerable difficulty in comprehending those arguments, fully. But, Sir, I would ask what will be the state of public opinion on the subject? The public opinion will be, that we asked the Court of Queen's Bench to give its decision on this question, involving these privileges; — that the House would have availed itself of that decision, if that had been favourable to our views; but now that it is against us, if we take the course that is recommended by the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman, it will be said, that, having submitted your case to the court, you would have availed yourselves of the judgment, had it been in unison with your opinions; but as it was adverse, you refuse to abide by it.

How, then, do you propose to act? Having declared that the court, by presuming to decide upon matters of privilege, has been guilty of contempt, do you attempt to attack the chief authority? No; it is proposed to proceed against the ministerial officer, who will be placed in this anomalous situation, — that if he levy, in conformity with the decision of the court, this House will commit him for a breach of its privileges; and if he obey this House, and do not levy, that the Court of Queen's Bench will commit him for disobedience. Is the sheriff the party who ought to be made responsible for violating the privileges of this House? No; it would be more consistent with the boldness of proceeding which has been recommended, if this House held that the court and tribunal had been guilty of contempt, and should commit the superior officers, if they persisted, instead of proceeding against the inferior officer, who is bound to obey the orders and decisions of the court, — who naturally looks up to his superiors, and is merely an instrument in their hands. It is a bad and dangerous example to set to the ministerial officer, — it is, in fact, teaching him not to obey the law of the land. What is the course that the House has pursued? It submitted to the tribunal; — the House had the power of stopping the proceedings at once, by telling the individual who was plaintiff in the cause, that he had no right to go to any other tribunal than this House, as it was the only judge of matters involving its own privileges, and that if he persisted he would be committed for contempt. The House, however, allowed and instructed its servant to plead, and directed counsel to appear for him before the court. The Attorney General appeared and argued the case, for three days, in the most able manner. You allowed the court to consider the case, and to believe that you submitted the matter to its decision, and that you were a willing party before it; — nay, the judges were bound by their oaths to deal with the case and decide one way or the other; — and, in confirmation of this view of the case, I would ask, how did the Attorney General conclude his speech to the court? Why, in a manner to confirm such an opinion in the minds of the judges. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman concluded in these words: — "My Lords, I pray judgment for the defendants." Yet it is proposed, that the officer who acted for the sheriff of London should be committed if he levy the execution! I ask, is this the proper step to take after the course the House has allowed to be pursued?

So far then, Sir, with respect to my personal consistency, I trust I have satisfied the Honourable Member opposite that I foresaw all these difficulties, and that I was influenced by the consideration of these consequences in proposing the course which I formerly suggested.

And now, as regards my opinion on the subject immediately before the House, I have no hesitation in saying that I believe this privilege of determining what shall be published for the information of the public mind is absolutely essential to the usefulness of Parliament, and to the proper discharge of legislative functions. I do not believe it possible that you could sit for one week, with honour to yourselves or advantage to the country, if you were liable to have this privilege questioned in a court of law. Once you are questioned in the Court of Queen's Bench, you may be questioned by any subordinate court of judicature in the empire: but I care not for that; for if it be competent for any superior court — even the highest — to determine upon the publication of these papers, from that moment you hold your privileges on sufferance; and then, I say, you had better suspend the attempt to exercise them at all, than exercise them under such circumstances. Am I to be told that I shrink from giving an opinion on this subject, or from the consideration of what is best to be done under the circumstances? No! But I feel this question of maintaining intact the privilege of this House so strongly, that I will not consent to encumber it with the consideration of injury inflicted upon a single individual. We have also to consider whether we present ourselves in the best position, in thus refusing acquiescence in the decision of a court of law, after having, to all appearance, submitted our case. The Report states, that it is the duty of the committee to present to the House a full and comprehensive view of the practical bearings of the question. Now, we are well aware that the course recommended is not one likely to be successful, unless it should meet with very general concurrence and support. I cannot but regret that it is necessary to take any practical step before there has been an opportunity of enlightening the public mind upon the merits of the question. I really believe that nine out of ten people are disposed to decide the question upon the ground that the House of Commons has opened a shop for the sale of papers of this description; whereas the Lord Chief Justice has given his opinion, that the fact of the sale of the papers forms no element in the consideration of the case. The real question is, whether it is expedient for the House, in the present imperfect state of information existing in the public mind, to decide, this night, at all hazards, to retrace its steps, as such a course is called, and to direct the sheriff not to execute the judgment pronounced by the Court of Queen's Bench? or, whether it would not be better to wait until the whole matter can be fairly and deliberately reviewed? There are several courses open to the House, to which I see many objections; but upon which, nevertheless, I do not wish to decide while the public opinion remains in its present state, and when the House itself has not fully considered all the consequences of the various courses proposed to it. My own opinion is, that it is now too late to retrace the step which has been taken; and that it was the duty of the House, in the first instance, to have refused to submit the question of their privilege to the arbitration of the Court of Queen's Bench; and I have a strong warrant for the correctness of that conclusion, in the indication of opinion which appeared in the course of the very judgment now under discussion, with reference to the position in which the House would have stood, if, instead of defending the action, it had committed the plaintiff for contempt. In the course of that judgment, Mr. Justice Littledale laid down some propositions which went to show that, if the latter course had been taken, the Court of Queen's Bench would have had very great difficulty in coming to a decision adverse to the privilege of this House. Mr. Justice Littledale said that, in the case of commitments for contempt, the House was the sole judge whether it was a contempt or not; and that there was no doubt as to the right, as exercised by the House of Parliament, with regard to contempts. I think that, by taking this course, the House would have stood a greater chance of having public opinion on their side; and in public opinion consists their principal support, — for their privileges are not held by the House for the benefit of its own Members, but for that of the public. If it were only with reference to the effect of the proceedings upon the opinion of the public, I confess, I should be sorry to be obliged, in the discharge of my duty in this House, to consent to commit the sheriff of London to prison for obeying the orders of the Court of Queen's Bench. Nor would the matter end there: the House may depend upon it that the judges would interfere to protect their officer, and that it would become necessary to bring the judges to the bar of the House, and to commit them also. Those consequences, however, would constitute no reason why the House should not do its duty, if it was a clear one, and one upon which no doubt existed. If a similar case occurred to-morrow, I should recommend that the House should deal with it without hesitation; and determine that, as a case involving its privileges, it should not be submitted to a court of judicature. In such a case, there would be a proper exercise of the authority of the House of Commons, when it committed for contempt. But I hesitate in giving it as my opinion that it is the duty of the House to resist the authority of the Court of Queen's Bench, after having once submitted to its jurisdiction. To return, however, to the opinion of Mr. Justice Littledale, to which I have referred. The whole passage of the learned judge's speech is in these words: —

> There is no doubt about the right, as exercised by the two Houses of Parliament, with regard to contempts or insults offered to the House either within or without the walls: there is no doubt, either, as to the freedom of their Members from arrest, nor of their right to summon witnesses, to require the production of papers and records, and the right of printing documents for the use of the members of the constitutional body, and as to any other thing which may appear to be necessary to carry on and conduct the great and important functions of their charge.

I will therefore say, do not disregard public opinion on this or other similar constitutional subjects; but take care that, in your proceedings, you have that most powerful sanction. The Honourable Gentleman who moved the amendment said that he was satisfied that any person who was at all acquainted with the subject, and that all classes of society, would coincide with them in an attempt to vindicate and maintain the privileges of this House. I do not think that the proceeding which the Honourable Gentlemen has proposed is the right mode to be adopted. It is, however, of immense importance that any erroneous impression which has been produced on the public mind should be removed, that it [may be shown] that the maintenance of the right was essential for the public welfare. But to proceed with the opinion of Mr. Justice Littledale:—

In the case of commitments for contempts, there is no doubt but the House is the sole judge whether it is a contempt, or not; and the courts of common law will not inquire into it. The greater part of these decisions and dicta, where the judges have said that the Houses of Parliament are the sole judges of their own privileges, have been where the question has arisen upon commitments for contempt, and as to which, as I have before remarked, no doubt can be entertained. But not only the two Houses of Parliament, but every court in Westminster Hall, are themselves the sole judges whether it be a contempt, or not; although, in cases where the court did not profess to commit for a contempt, but for some matter which, by no reasonable intendment, could be considered as a contempt of the court committing, but a ground of commitment palpably and evidently unjust, and contrary to law and natural justice, Lord Ellenborough says, that in the case of such a commitment, if it should ever occur (but which he says he could not possibly anticipate as ever likely to occur), the court must look at it and act upon it as justice may require, from whatever court it may profess to have proceeded.

If the other judges concurred in this opinion of Mr. Justice Littledale, then, I say, I would fight the battle of privilege upon the question of contempt, rather than, by pleading in the action first, submit to the judgment of the court, and then refuse to abide by its decision, because it is unfavourable. These are the grounds upon which, while I cordially concur in the resolution of the House upon the subject of its privileges, I cannot advise it to tell the sheriff that if he proceeds to execute the judgment of the court he shall be committed. Neither can I advise the House to appeal from the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench to the Exchequer Chamber or to the other House; for, by so doing, it would be still further recognising a breach of its privileges. Many difficulties would arise from attempting to pass a declaratory or enabling Act. Let not those remedies be resorted to, until the efficacy of a committal for contempt has been fairly tried. I have no doubt that, even if that course were taken, the question would be brought before the Court of Queen's Bench; but then the House would have the dicta of learned judges in its favour. The House is only asked by the Noble Lord the Secretary for the Home Department to pledge itself to the immediate consideration of its present position; and, upon a fair balance of the conveniences and inconveniences of each of the courses before it,—taking, also, into consideration the actual state of the public mind upon the subject,—not to acquiesce in the judgment which has been given, but merely to refrain from taking any step to prevent that judgment being carried into execution. I still retain the opinion, that this privilege of the House of Commons is absolutely necessary to the effectual exercise of its authority, and the proper discharge of its functions; although there may be some difficulty in deciding, what it may within a few weeks become necessary to determine,—namely, in what way the House ought to proceed in the vindication of its privileges.

The ATTORNEY GENERAL.—Sir, I feel, very strongly, the truth of an observation made by my Noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, that this is not a Government question. Sir, this cannot be a party question, for in it are involved the privileges of the Commons of England; and all the Members of this House have but one common duty to perform,—namely, to assert their privileges for the benefit of their constituents. I feel myself called upon to differ from my Noble Friend the Secretary for the Home Department, and from the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, as to the line of conduct which they have severally recommended the House to adopt. I am of opinion, that the time has now come for the House to make a stand; and that, unless it do so, its privileges are for ever gone. It has not been made a party question hitherto, for, in the vote which I gave in the committee upon this subject, I was joined by the Right Honourable Member for Montgomeryshire and the Honourable Baronet the Member for Stamford, and by other Honourable Gentlemen on the opposite side. I hope that, when the House comes to a division to-night, it will turn out that this is, really, no party question. In the first place, I must observe that the Honourable Baronet the Member for the University of Oxford is quite consistent in the course which he has taken, and, upon his own premises has come to a just conclusion. The Honourable Baronet thinks that the House ought to have no such privilege as that which it now claims, and therefore he very properly infers that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench ought to be acquiesced in. On the premises assumed by the Honourable Baronet, it would, of course, be a monstrous injustice to resist the payment of damages in a case like the present; for it would be nothing else than setting an example to individuals of resisting the execution of a solemn judgment pronounced by a court of competent jurisdiction. The Honourable Baronet, therefore, was quite right in arriving at such a result, upon his own hypothesis. But when I hear my Noble Friend the Secretary for the Home Department declaring that it is essential for the House of Commons to possess the privilege contended for, and that without it the House could not properly discharge its duty,— when I find my Noble Friend is of opinion that this judgment was an improper one, and contrary to the privileges of one House of Parliament,—and when I find the Right Honourable Baronet opposite agreeing with my Noble Friend, — then I must say, that, concurring with my Noble Friend and the Right Honourable Baronet in those opinions, — taking my Noble Friend's premises for granted,—I cannot but think that the conclusion to which my Noble Friend has come is most erroneous. If this House has privileges, and if one of them, highly essential, be invaded, there must be some means by which such a privilege can be vindicated; and as no other plan has been pointed out, I think that the judgment which has been given ought not to be acquiesced in. My Noble Friend has said — and I agree with him in saying—that what is unjust is wrong—— —and that, if John Joseph Stockdale has acquired, by a lawful judgment, a right to receive 100*l.*, the House would be guilty of great injustice in depriving him of it. But my Noble Friend does not think the judgment a lawful one: he says the judgment is wrong; and that it is a flagrant usurpation, on the part of the Court of Queen's Bench, of one of the most valuable privileges of the Commons of Great Britain. If it be a lawful judgment, let it be obeyed; but if it be an unlawful judgment, let it be resisted: and my Noble Friend, by concurring in the very Report now under discussion, has declared the right of the House to offer resistance upon such an occasion. In that Report it is set forth, that the House might avail itself of the constitutional power which it possesses, to prevent the execution of the judgment obtained against Messrs. Hansard. If that constitutional power were to be surrendered, every other privilege would follow; for it is placed in the same category with privilege from arrest, with the power of summoning witnesses, with that of compelling the production of deeds and documents, and that of committing for contempt. But suppose the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench to say, "You can punish persons for breaches of privilege in proper cases,— but we must determine what are proper cases." Now suppose the case of a person committed for equivocation at the bar, and who brings his action; suppose a plea to be put in, which plea is overruled, and that the sergeant-at-arms is called upon to pay damages. Suppose, in the case of Burdett v. Abbott, judgment had been given for the plaintiff, instead of the defendant; suppose the plea had been overruled, and that Lord Ellenborough and the other judges had held that there was no defence; damages would have followed,— not 100*l.*, as in this case, but probably 5000*l.* What would the House then have done? Would it have allowed the mace to be taken in execution?

[Laughter.]

[Cries of "Hear!" and laughter.]

—for the action, there, was against the Speaker of the House of Commons. Would the House have suffered the sheriff of Middlesex to enter the Speaker's house and carry off that "bauble"—which would, in that case, be a bauble, indeed? or would the House have permitted the sheriff to seize the Speaker's furniture— his chairs and tables— in satisfaction of the damages? I apprehend that the House would have permitted no such thing, but would have given notice to the sheriff, as it is now proposed to do, not to levy the damages; and would have committed him for violating the privilege of the House of Commons, if he had refused to obey its order. Where, upon the premises laid down by my Noble Friend the Secretary for the Home Department, and the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, is the distinction between the case which I have just supposed, and that now before the House? They would have said as they now say, that they could not advise an appeal to the Court of Exchequer Chamber, nor the passing of a declaratory or an enabling Act. What, then, would have been the course which they would have recommended? Why, what other could it have been than that suggested to the committee by the Honourable and Learned Member for Newark and the Honourable Member for Bridport? The Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth rested the whole of his argument on this ground,— that the House has appeared in the action. He thinks the House ought to have resisted in the first instance. Now, with great respect to the Right Honourable Baronet, I must say that such an opinion is completely a mistake and a delusion, and that there is no reason whatever for the House to repent of the course which it has taken. If it had committed Stockdale for contempt, it would not have carried public opinion with it. Its situation is now a different, and, in my humble judgment, an improved one. In the first place, after the determination to which the House had come, upon mature deliberation, in the case of Burdett v. Abbott,—after appearing and pleading in that case,—how could the House have neglected the precedent which it had itself made, and have committed Stockdale for contempt? Was it not calculated to have a greater effect in obtaining the concurrence of the people at large, if the House acted in this case as it had acted in the former instance; and, in the first instance, placed its confidence in the regular tribunals of the country, which hitherto had acknowledged and supported the privileges of Parliament? But, in the second place, let me remind the House that the committal for contempt would not have stopped the action. The plaintiff, although in goal, would have gone on to file his declaration; judgment would have gone by default; and damages would have been levied under a writ of execution, just as they may be to-morrow, unless the House interfere. The Right Honourable Gentleman, in support of his view of the case, quoted the opinion of Mr. Justice Littledale. Now, although it is true that that learned judge intimated his opinion that courts of common law had no jurisdiction to examine the grounds of commitment for contempt by the two Houses of Parliament, yet Lord Denman appeared not entirely to concur in that opinion, and cited the cases of "The King v. Patys," and "The King v. Curry." So that, in the first place, if the Lord Chief Justice retained this opinion, Stockdale would have triumphed; he would have been discharged under the writ of habeas corpus; and, in the next place, whether he was discharged, or remained in Newgate, the action would have proceeded; the House must have appeared and pleaded, or have suffered judgment to go by default; and, in either case, the House would have been placed in the same dilemma as that in which it now finds itself. Therefore I cannot regret the course which the House has taken. It has proceeded in the vindication of its privileges with moderation and patience, and has done all that lay in its power to avoid, as long as possible, a collision with the courts of ordinary judicature in this country. The House appealed to the Court of Queen's Bench, in the confident expectation that that court would respect its privileges, and act on established precedents. What was done in the case of Chief Justice Pemberton and Mr. Justice Jones? They stood at the bar of the House for having given a most unrighteous judgment; and their defence was, that the House had pleaded to the jurisdiction,—and that if the House had pleaded in bar, they would have given judgment in its favour. So that, on the authority of Chief Justice Pemberton and Mr. Justice Jones, when the plaintiff did plead in bar, and show that the decision was by the authority of the House of Commons, the authority of the House of Commons was respected. Suppose, in the present case, that the decision had been the other way, and there had been judgment for the defendant; would not the whole House have rejoiced in the line of conduct it had pursued? Would not the public have rejoiced that a collision had been avoided? As to John Joseph Stockdale, he might have applied for a habeas corpus, and would have been liberated. I allow that the difficulties in the case are very great—that they are unexampled. But why? Because a court of common law has taken upon itself to overrule the privileges of this House. This is a case which the constitution did not anticipate, and for which, therefore, no remedy has been provided. Since Westminster Hall has existed,—with the exception of those infamous judges who disgraced the reigns of Charles II. and James II.—with the exception of the case of "The King v. Elliott," where the judges did maintain that Members of Parliament might be amenable for what was said in Parliament,—with these exceptions, the judges of Westminster Hall have uniformly respected the privileges of both Houses of Parliament. I am bound to say, conscientiously, that it is my firm opinion that the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench in the case of "Stockdale v. Hansard" is contrary to law;—that it is a usurpation of the privileges of the House of Commons—a flagrant usurpation of those privileges—by the Court of Queen's Bench.

As to the House having submitted to the jurisdiction of the court by pleading, I will suggest this case;—suppose an action to be brought on the commitment of a Member of Parliament for words spoken in his place in the House,—suppose he were to bring an action of assault and false imprisonment,—the House would be bound to plead, for the court would have jurisdiction on the subject. Well, there would be an appearance and a plea; and the Speaker—(for against him the action would be brought)—would allege that the Member had been guilty of a breach of privilege. There would be a demurrer to the plea, and judgment on the demurrer; and then the House would, in such a case, submit to the Court of Queen's Bench the question, whether or not it had a right to exercise a jurisdiction over its own Members? If the Court should decide, in such a case, that the House had no such jurisdiction, and should give judgment against the House, would it be said, "Let us pass it over now, but we won't submit next time; pro hâc vice, we will allow the judges of the Queen's Bench to be the arbitrators of the privileges of the House, and we will not resist the execution of the judgment they have pronounced?" I apprehend the House would be bound to resist it; and it is the same thing, now. With all respect to the Right Honourable Baronet, I must say that he is guilty of a mere fallacy. He might just as well say that he would submit to the Court of Queen's Bench whether both Houses of Parliament and the Queen have a right to legislate? They have a right to legislate in the land, but no better right than the House of Commons has to determine its own privileges.

Then, what is to be done? I concur in the view taken by the Right Honourable Baronet of the different courses. I think the House cannot appeal: though I might hope that the judgment might be reversed, yet a writ of error would be a voluntary act; and, if the judgment was affirmed, it would be impossible to resist its execution. What is the next course that has been suggested? — A declaratory Act; and I agree with the Right Honourable Baronet that this would be highly inexpedient, because I think the law is abundantly clear already; and, although the Bill might pass this House, its fate elsewhere cannot be known, and there is the greatest objection to the passing of a declaratory Act in the face of the unanimous judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench. If the House should persist in holding that the judgment was illegal, that is another thing; but if it pass a declaratory Act, it will have acquiesced in it. Then, an enabling Act is still more objectionable and humiliating; for it would not only be an acknowledgment that you have not the privilege for which you contend, but it would be a confession that you have no privileges but such as the judges of the Queen's Bench choose to allow,—that is, that they are judges of the privileges of the House of Commons; though those very judges (the predecessors of the present judges) have said, over and over again, that they knew not the law of Parliament, — that it was a law they were not called upon to administer, — that the House of Commons, and the House of Commons alone, or both Houses of Parliament, were the judges each of its own privileges, and the constitutional tribunals to decide these questions. The present judges say that the House may examine witnesses, and do various other acts, and that its Members are free from arrest; but I know not what their successors may be disposed to decide; for the predecessors of the existing court had declared, as I have said, that Parliament alone has the power of inquiring into and of deciding upon its own privileges. If, therefore, the present judgment were admitted, it is impossible to say where the current which runs against you might stop. In the case of "Ashby v. White," Lord Holt gave an opinion contrary to that of the other three judges of the court, and all the judges since Lord Holt have said that Lord Holt was wrong; but Lord Denman says that Lord Holt's reasons were more easily outvoted than answered. What, then, is to be done? It has been said, "The next time any such action is brought, we will commit." Commit whom? — the plaintiff, for bringing the action? That, the Court of Queen's Bench have decided, may be done according to law, — and that you have acquiesce in. Then, what is to become of these damages? How are they to be paid? I presume that they will form an item in the Miscellaneous Estimates. But will not that document be quoted, hereafter, to show that this House did acquiesce in this judgment so far as to pay damages out of the public purse? Then, when next an action is brought, if the House should commit the plaintiff, I undertake to say that it would not carry with it public opinion so much as it does now. But suppose the House were to commit the plaintiff, it could not stop the action; it would go before the same tribunal, which would have to decide whether the action was maintainable or not; judgment would go against the House; there would be another assessment of damages; and the House would have again to say whether the damages should be paid, or the sheriff be committed; and how would the House be in a better situation, then, than now? I say that the House would be in a worse situation, for it would have a judgment against it in which it had acquiesced: and would it not be hard to say to the plaintiff, — "You shall go to Newgate, though we have thought it right to pay 100*l.* to Mr. John Joseph Stockdale?" Would this be just? I admit that my mind vacillates on the subject. So long as I thought any other course could be adopted, I would not recommend the present; on the contrary, I would have rejoiced if any other course could have been pointed out. But the position of the Right Honourable Baronet is, that it is a choice between resistance now and resistance hereafter, seeing that the next time an action is brought, the plaintiff might be committed. I think that that would be deferring the evil day to a period when public opinion might be against the House; and there would be this additional difficulty,—that it would be resisting, in one case, what it had acquiesced in, in another. I admit that the case is full of difficulty; but we are not bound to suppose that the sheriff would be placed in the disagreeable situation suggested. The House would record its opinion that it was a case of privilege; and it is impossible that the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench could be of opinion that a writ ought to be sued out, and that Stockdale ought to be paid damages. Is it to be supposed that the judges would issue illegal orders? If the Court of Queen's Bench were to issue an order to pay the damages, they would be issuing an illegal order, and an order against the privileges of this House; and, if so, the House would be only calling upon the sheriff of Middlesex not to execute a writ contrary to the law of the land.

Sir, I feel deeply that this is a most serious crisis at which we have arrived; but I maintain that this House has not been involved in the difficulty by any fault of its own. And here let me be permitted to observe, that I cannot speak of the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench but with profound respect; I entertain the highest veneration and esteem for all those learned judges; but in this case, affecting the privileges of the House, I say that the crisis has not been produced by any blame of its own. And not only has the Court determined that the privilege claimed by the House is a usurpation, but the judges have asserted a right to examine all your privileges. Mr. Justice Patteson, above all others, laid down the rule, that if a declaration disclosed any circumstance over which the court had jurisdiction, although it should appear that that act had been done by the authority of either House of Parliament, the court had a right to be judges of the privileges of this House. This was a most alarming dictum. Either this House is paramount, or the Court of Queen's Bench is paramount. The judges say, the court is paramount. The constitution has provided no specific remedy for such an evil; but I think that the least evil, now, would be to resist the writ. I do not despair of public opinion being, now, in our favour, more especially when the public must see that it is no immunity for ourselves, that we are contending for; that it is for the benefit of our constituents, to let them know on what it is we are legislating; and the matter in dispute is a mere trifle. The Court of Queen's Bench have said that the House might print 658 copies for the use of its Members, and if any damage ensued to private character from the dissemination of those 658 copies, it was damnum absque injuriâ. But is it not palpable that an individual may suffer as great a slander by the circulation of 658 copies, as if it had been proclaimed by sound of trumpet? Then, Sir, I would ask, who is the hero in the present case? On whose account are the privileges of this House called in question? The author — no, not the author, the publisher — of the Memoirs of Harriette Wilson, — a book so infamous, that, in an action brought against Stockdale for printing it, he pleaded his own infamy, and said the book was so immoral that any contract respecting it was an immoral contract, and could not be enforced. Is it likely that the House could calculate, with any probability, hereafter, more strongly upon the concurrence of public opinion than in such a case? Sir, I have thought it right thus to express my sentiments. I have looked round and round, most anxiously, to discover any other course to be adopted; but I can find none better than that suggested by the amendment which has been moved. I am strongly of opinion that the time has come at which this House must make a stand, or its privileges are gone for ever; and, upon these principles, I shall vote for the amendment.

Mr. PEMBERTON. — Sir, I must be permitted to observe, that, in whatever observations he has made, in whatever arguments he has used, on this question, my Honourable and Learned Friend has been far from consistent. I did believe that, from the first day on which he declared his opinion, to the last, he had distinctly said, again and again, that there were many courses open to the House to adopt. "You may bring in a declaratory Act; you may bring in an enabling Act; and you may, in future cases, assert your privileges: but there is one course which you must discard as not to be considered." "What!" said my Honourable and Learned Friend, the assertor of the law of the land and of the privileges of Parliament, "can you invite a plaintiff into a court of justice, — submit his claims to the determination of the judges, — argue the question at their bar for three whole days, — require and compel them to pronounce sentence, — take advantage of their judgment if in your favour, — go to a jury and have the damages assessed, taking the chance of one farthing or one hundred pounds; — can you do all this? and then can you — in common decency can you — turn round and tell the people of England that you have consented to abide by this chance, that you do not complain of the damages awarded against you being excessive, but that you do complain that the judgment of the court is against you?" I ask, Sir, — did my Honourable and Learned Friend, from first to last, until this evening, express any other opinion than that? Those who dissented, originally, from the resolutions of 1837, have the satisfaction of knowing that they are embarrassed by none of the difficulties which now environ this question. We voted against the resolutions, not because we doubted that the House of Commons had privileges, but we voted against them because they laid down the law, as I can show by my Honourable and Learned Friend's own admission at the bar of the Court of Queen's Bench, in opposition to the admitted, acknowledged law of the land; we voted against the course then taken because we considered it entirely illegal. But we are now ready, as we ever have been, to concur in any measure the House may consider necessary for the purpose of conferring on you the power — which I contend you have not by any privilege you possess, or any means of enforcing any privilege you possess — of protecting all persons acting under your authority from criminal or other proceedings in courts of justice. Sir, I repeat, my Honourable and Learned Friend appears to have been guilty of inconsistency throughout. When the action was brought, what said my Honourable and Learned Friend? Did he say, "Commit the plaintiff" — "Use your privileges?" No, Sir; he said, "Abandon them." "Let the Members of this House," to adopt the expressive and eloquent phraseology of the Honourable Member for Kilkenny, "be dragged through the mud." My Honourable and Learned Friend said, "Don't be apprehensive; place yourselves under my guidance." But the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth said, "Let us pause; suppose we are mistaken:" and now that the Right Honourable Gentleman, with perfect consistency, objects to a course of which he foresaw the results, you turn round and accuse him of inconsistency! The Honourable and Learned Gentleman opposite has been leading us through this case for the last two years; and, now that it has terminated, we are at the very opposite points of the compass. We are now asked to try another road; but are those who propose it certain that it will lead to a different result from that which we have already arrived at? Sir, I apprehend the only question now is, whether, in the present state of the proceedings, we can, with common justice or common decency, interfere to prevent the execution of the writ? And if we did attempt it, could we by possibility succeed? Observe what course you could adopt. There is none open to you but the vindictive one of committing the party to prison,—and that you could not do without justifying such a step by some reasonable grounds. Mr. Stockdale complained of a libel having been published by an officer of the House of Commons, and brought an action against him. Did the House of Commons appear in that action? I would ask those Gentlemen who are insisting that the judges have decided directly against the privileges of the House of Commons, whether the Attorney General was or was not distinctly instructed by the House, itself, to appear for the defendants in that action, and to call for the judgment of the court in their favour? The Honourable and Learned Gentleman put in a plea that the publication was justified, because it was under the order of the House of Commons.

And here I would take the liberty of requesting the attention of Honourable Members to a circumstance of no little importance, and to which I referred in the committee, — namely, the misstatement of the date of their own resolution. The very resolution of the House of Commons which stated that the publication of their proceedings was essentially incidental to the functions of Parliament, and especially of the House of Commons, — that very resolution which, it has been stated, was twelve months antecedent to the date of the action, — was not passed for twelve days after the action. That was a very important error — an error which I am sure no one would attempt to defend by saying that we ought to meet such a case by an ex post facto proceeding. The Attorney General admitted the insufficiency of that resolution, and thereupon both parties called for judgment. Where, then, is the act of contempt? and who was guilty of it? Was it the judges, or the counsel, or the jury, or the sheriff? And if no party have been guilty of contempt, — if you assented to the prosecution and conduct of the action, — if you met the party in a court of law, and there contested the question with him, — can you, in common decency, attempt now to interfere and arrest the progress of the decision which has been made in that court, rob the plaintiff of its fruits, and expose him to all costs which had been incurred in a prosecution, that you had invited him to continue? If you had had judgment in your favour, the costs would consequently have fallen on the plaintiff in the action; — but it turned out otherwise; the plaintiff has obtained judgment, and he now calls for the fruits of it; and yet you propose to interfere and supersede the law of the land, which, in this case, you distinctly invoked. I would ask how any man could, with common decency, put forth such a case as that to the people of England? Is there any one who could believe that the people of England would do otherwise than cry shame upon the House of Commons for such an enormous outrage? In what position would it place you? You first endeavour to obtain judgment by fair means; then, like the fraudulent gamester, who first takes his chance of the die, and afterwards tries to evade the just payment of the debt by bluster and intimidation, you endeavour to deprive the successful party of the fruits of the result by an unjust and arbitrary proceeding. The Honourable Member for Bridport it is, I believe, who has called upon the House to vindicate the resolutions of 1837. But has the Attorney General vindicated those resolutions? He has not; — he, doubtless, will not; — and I can prove, from the Honourable and Learned Gentleman's own argument and admission, that he distinctly abandons that part of the resolutions of the committee of 1837, which states, —

> Your committee, having considered the subject of parliamentary privilege, and the jurisdiction of this House to determine the extent of its own privileges, submit as their opinion, that, by the law and usage of Parliament, the House of Commons does possess an exclusive jurisdiction, and that it is a breach of its privileges to bring them into discussion for decision before any other tribunal, directly or incidentally, and that such breach of privilege subjects the parties to punishment by this House.

Now, I would ask, is there a lawyer in the House — not excepting the Honourable and Learned Attorney General — who is prepared to stand by that resolution, or say it should be enforced? I believe there is not. The next resolution is similar in substance, and states, generally, that the action brought against Messrs. Hansard is a breach of the privileges of this House. But I beg the attention of the Learned Member for Newark to pages 15. and 16. of the Report of the proceedings in this case; and, having read them, to say whether it was not distinctly admitted by the Attorney General that it was no breach of privilege to discuss any question of privilege that came "incidentally" before a tribunal? Having stated this, he says that his proposition is, that the question, being one of privilege, arises directly — not incidentally, — and that, over it, a court of common law has no jurisdiction. My Honourable and Learned Friend the Attorney General states that the judgment was erroneous; but, if he dare not dispute its legality, upon what pretence can he resist the execution of it? What advantage will you gain by doing so? You may threaten to commit the sheriff; but what would be the result? Would that prevent the execution of the writ? No; for if the sheriff disobeyed the Court of Queen's Bench, the writ would be executed by others, while the sheriff would be liable to be committed for contempt of the Court of Queen's Bench, and also to an action from the plaintiff for refusing to levy the damages which had been awarded him. Again, what would be the consequence of an attempt to commit the sheriff, in case he proceeded to obey the Court of Queen's Bench? Do you suppose that the Court of Queen's Bench will allow its officer to be thrown into prison at your instance? I am persuaded, if you do suppose any such thing, that you will find yourselves greatly mistaken. I am persuaded, moreover, that the people of England would not tamely stand by and see the authority of the courts of justice set at nought, and the laws subverted. I am convinced, too, that the House of Lords would interfere. But will you venture to commit the judges? Will you commit Lord Denman? Do not flinch from the consideration of that. It is idle to commit the sheriff. It is weak and paltry to take vengeance on those who have no power of defence, and shrink from the encounter with those who have directly authorised the proceedings. But you will not attempt to touch the judges. Why? Because you dare not do it; — because you know you cannot do it by law; — because you know the people would not stand by and see you attempt it. The very stones of Westminster Hall would cry aloud at such a monstrous exercise of arbitrary power under the name of "privilege." We are told it is a breach of the privileges of the House of Commons for a court of justice to decide contrary to their determination. But the same authority tells us that it was not the privilege of the House of Commons, or of the House of Lords, but of Parliament — the same in both Houses. Now, it appears that the House of Commons, in 1703, resolved just as they have recently resolved. On the 26th of January, 1703, the House of Commons passed the following resolution: —

That whosoever shall presume to commence or prosecute any action, indictment, or information, which shall bring the right of the electors, or persons elected to serve in Parliament, to the determination of any other jurisdiction than that of the House of Commons (except in cases specially provided for by Act of Parliament), such person and persons, and all attorneys, solicitors, counsellors, and serjeants-at-law, soliciting, prosecuting, or pleading in any such case, are guilty of a high breach of the privileges of this House.

The present House of Commons has come to a resolution which could be rendered similar to this by substituting the words "action for libel," for those referring to the "right of electors" in the resolution I have just read. But what, let me ask, had the House of Lords done at the same period? On the 27th of March, 1704, they came to this resolution: —

That the declaring Matthew Ashley guilty of a breach of privilege of the House of Commons, for prosecuting an action against the constables of Aylesbury, for not receiving his vote at an election, after he had, in the known and proper method of law, obtained a judgment in Parliament for the recovery of his damages, is an unprecedented attempt upon the judicature of Parliament, and is, in effect, to subject the laws of England to the votes of the House of Commons; that the deterring electors from prosecuting actions in the ordinary courts of law, when they are deprived of their right of voting, and terrifying attorneys, solicitors, counsellors, and serjeants-at-law, from soliciting, prosecuting, and pleading in such cases, by voting their doing so to be a breach of the privileges of the House of Commons, is a manifest assuming a power to control the law, to hinder the course of justice, and subject the property of Englishmen to the arbitrary votes of the House of Commons.

Looking to the resolutions so frequently referred to in the course of the present discussion, I find them diametrically opposed to each other; and will any one in this House tell me that the courts of law must take the determinations of one of the Houses of Parliament as a sole and infallible guide? It really would seem that Stockdale is the only party by whom a breach of privilege has been committed; and the absurdity lies in this, — that the House does not attempt to punish him. You appear quite disposed to deal out a severe measure of punishment against the counsel, against the attorney, against the judge; but not a word about inflicting any punishment upon Stockdale, who has, if any one has, been guilty of a breach of your privileges. You appear disposed to punish those who could not, if they would, obey you, — who certainly could not obey, for the House had never intimated its wishes or commands. Do Honourable Gentlemen recollect that the sheriff of London has solemnly sworn to execute the writs which her Majesty's justices may issue? Can it form a part of the privileges of the House of Commons to punish him for not violating his oath? The Court of Queen's Bench would punish the sheriff for not executing the writs; and will the House of Commons, then, punish him for executing them? I firmly believe that there is no part of the civilised world which would not condemn such a course of proceeding. I entreat the House to pause — I entreat Honourable Gentlemen to bear in mind the present disturbed state of the country, and the influence these proceedings may have upon the public mind. And mark, too, the time at which this course is proposed. When a spirit of opposition to the law is abroad — when districts are so disturbed, that the Noble Lord the Home Secretary has invited men to arm in associations for protection, — in such a state of things it is proposed that the House of Commons should set the frightful example of a barefaced opposition to the solemn doctrine of the judges, and the acknowledged law of the land. I cannot entertain the shadow of a doubt that the motion of the Honourable Member for Bridport will be negatived by this House. I am glad, now, to abstain from entering into the consideration of the question, as to what power the House ought to have, which, however, sooner or later, must come before you. You have not the information to enable you to decide it, and therefore it is better postponed. But I have heard it suggested, by what I consider high authority, that it might be possible, without any compromise of the dignity of the House, to place this matter on a footing which, while it should effect no alteration in the law, would work the greatest alteration in public feeling. It is clear that if you refer the question at issue to the decision of any other tribunal, you must admit that you are bound in law by the judgment of that tribunal; whereas if you confine yourselves to the simple case before you, much of the embarrassment by which you are surrounded may be removed. You are in a position in which you may, with some prospect of success, conciliate public feeling by rescinding an objectionable resolution, and making it evident that you seek for the establishment of privilege barely to the extent that is necessary for promoting the public interest, by the due discharge of the functions of the representatives of the people. But if you proceed to threaten the counsel and the attorneys, I hesitate not to tell you that you must be defeated. You may commit one barrister, but a hundred members of the profession would start forward to fill his place. Although little disposed to offer myself as a martyr, yet I, for one, would not be backward in discharging the duty which the bar owes to those who have claims upon their services. From the oldest and most eminent members of the profession — from my Learned Friend Sir Charles Wetherell to the junior who was called yesterday — there are hundreds who would infinitely rather incur your severest displeasure and endure the heaviest punishments which you could inflict, than be exposed, for a single hour, to the silent scorn they would meet in every eye if they shrunk from the duty they owe to their profession. It being so clear as to need no proof, that, if you enter into a contest with the bar, you must be defeated, I desire to know if you are disposed to enter into a conflict with the House of Lords? It is not unworthy of remark, that privilege is only thus maintained when it becomes subversive of the law of the land. I trust that you will not enter upon any course resembling those contests, the possibility of which I have been supposing, for you cannot come out of them with anything but discredit. If you succeed, it must be a triumph over the independence of the judges, over the majesty of the law, and over those rights and liberties of which you ought to be the chief and the foremost defenders.

Mr. SERJEANT WILDE. — Sir, although I am very unwilling to take any active part in this discussion, I cannot help attempting to contribute, to the utmost of my power, such information as may be necessary for the due consideration of the question. It appears to me, that any one who gets up to offer advice on this occasion, without feeling that it may lead to consequences extremely serious, — without feeling that he offers that advice under great responsibility, — would render his counsel innocuous, by showing that he did not duly appreciate the important occasion which had called it forth. Sir, I have bestowed some attention on this subject; but that attention was bestowed only with the most anxious desire to inform myself of the true conclusion which belonged to the question. And I am now desirous of respectfully submitting to the House what appears to me to be that conclusion, in the earnest hope and confidence that, if I have formed an erroneous one, it will be corrected by the wisdom of this House. Sir, I admit I have been unwilling to rise, because it does unfortunately so happen, that in those very matters on which the House has the greatest right to expect information from professional men, their interference is too often an embarrassment to the House, instead of an assistance, owing to the conflicting opinions which are elicited from them. I must say that I have been astonished at some of the opinions which my Honourable and Learned Friend has just expressed; and I could hardly have persuaded myself of the fact, if I had not known my Honourable and Learned Friend to be a lawyer, and one of great eminence in his profession. In offering my sentiments to the consideration of this House, I must beg, first, to observe, that you are in a situation in which you are compelled to act. I use the word in the largest sense; because, in forbearing to act, you will produce consequences as distinctly as you would by any affirmative act. I have to congratulate the House (feeling, as I do, to the full, the extreme difficulties by which we are surrounded) that the House has no fault to lay to its own charge. The House has not voluntarily embarked in this question. It has been forced upon the House; and to shrink from it would be to abandon our trust in the highest degree. This is not a case in which the House comes forward to claim an exemption or privilege for an individual Member. True, it is called by the name of "privilege;" but, in fact, as the judges truly said, it is not so much a case of privilege, as it is a question of the power of the House of Commons, and not of the privileges of its individual Members. Between power and privilege there is this distinction: — privilege, though given in order that the House might be the better able to discharge its duty to the community, necessarily operates to the benefit of individual Members; but power is for the public benefit alone; and the power that comes in question here, is the power of the people of England, exercised by their representatives, in carrying on the great affairs of the country. What are the duties that belong to them? The country appoints them to inquire into the execution of every department of the state, to ascertain abuses, to apply remedies, and to legislate as the wants and necessities of the state may require. What, then, does their power enable them to do? That is the question on which we are now engaged. We are not contending, now, for anything by which we, ourselves, can gain. Abuses might be concealed, delinquents escape, and the public suffer, by the House not possessing this power; but the Members could in no way be benefited by it. What would be the situation of the House, if, instead of claiming the right of publication, as incident and necessary to the discharge of its duty, it were to adopt a different course? What would be the condition of the country if this House determined not to publish?

Sir, we have petitions presented to this House complaining of abuses. We have petitions pointing out great occasions for the amendment of the law, or, perhaps, complaining of official misconduct. Suppose the House to inquire, and the public to demand the results of such inquiry; the answer must be, "The House dare not tell you." A public functionary might be charged with malversation in his office, or possibly a judge with misconduct in the discharge of his duty; but the public must be kept in ignorance, or information must be rendered to them anonymously of the facts ascertained and reported against him. The observation equally applies to a Minister, whom it is the peculiar duty of the House to watch and control. Look at the abuses which the House has exposed, and the alterations they have made in the law. You abolished the slave trade; you corrected the errors and inconveniences which had arisen in the course of time in corporations; you altered the poor laws. I need not detain the House by further enumeration; but how are you to satisfy the country respecting the necessity and efficiency of your legislation? How are you endeavouring to do so? or how can you do so, but by the publication of your Reports? Do you want to know what will be the situation of this House, if the lawyers of Westminster Hall are to prescribe the limits of your power? Then read the judgment in the case of Stockdale v. Hansard. No public exposure of the grounds of your proceedings would be permitted.

Sir, it seems to me, that we have arrived at a new era, by this decision of the Court of Queen's Bench. I have heard with regret, Members of this House do themselves injustice. They say they are the judges of their own privileges, and allow that the constitution of Parliament is distinct from the common law; but Members, even of the first intelligence, seem to disclaim the competency of judging, and to attach undue consideration to the merely legal bearings of this question. There may be technical considerations mixed up with it, on which the information of practical lawyers is necessary; but the main question depends, not on technical rules, nor on the confined views which belong to practical lawyers; — but, on broad and constitutional grounds. What powers are necessary for the discharge of the functions of the House of Commons? — and by what tribunal are they to be determined? I say that these are questions not to be decided by mere lawyers, but by men conversant with the constitution of the country. Moreover, Sir, I should be glad to know whether the state of the legal business of this country permits time and opportunity to the judges of the land to enter into practical constitutional questions affecting the privileges of this House? and if they are to decide upon what reports are and what are not to be published, when and where they are to condescend to acquire the necessary information to enable them to judge of such subjects? Is it reasonable, when the House has bestowed time and labour in making inquiries and giving subjects full discussion, that their judgment of what the public necessities require to be communicated to the country, should be set aside by the judges sitting in Westminster Hall? It is plain that the business of the country could not be carried on under such circumstances. A Right Honourable and Learned Friend who spoke early in the debate, has called the attention of the House to the circumstances under which this inquiry has arisen. I venture to think — I do so with real respect — but I cannot control my understanding, when I am satisfied after deliberate consideration of this subject — I believe, that there is no pretence to call the Report which has been brought in question a libel, when published by any one, still less after being published by order of this House. I know that Captain Baylis was held guilty of no offence in the publication of a letter relative to the abuses in Greenwich Hospital; for it was held to be a privileged communication. By the theory of the constitution, the Commons of England are all in this House. Even Chief Justice Holt, the enemy of privilege, said, — people of England are virtually in the House by their representatives.

When commissioners are appointed, by Act of Parliament, to inquire into the prisons of Great Britain, for the express purpose of legislation, I ask, are the people of England not generally interested in those inquiries? Shall it be said that a trial in a court of justice, where A. and B. are concerned, may be published; but that when Parliament directs an inquiry into the general management of prisons, by an almost judicial officer, and publishes the results, — the contents of these Reports may be deemed a libel? Shall it be said that the Commons of England, upon subjects of universal interest, may not communicate with each other, — while every tradesman may write letters, filled with libels from beginning to end, no matter into whose hands they may pass, if the extent of such libels be not mischievous and wanton, and beyond what the occasion may happen to require? Who is to decide for us what shall and what shall not be published, when we have the charge of the interests of the public? The judges? No. Their duties are much more limited. They are not to inquire what the law ought to be, or to ascertain its defects with a view to amendment, but to administer the law as it is; and they have deserted their functions, and usurped the authority of this House. Upon a subject of universal interest, which engaged the most careful attention of Parliament, commissioners were appointed to inquire, and to lay the results of their examination before the House. For what purpose? That they might be kept a profound secret? And this was done under the authority of an Act of Parliament. What then are the legal means — what is the machinery by which Parliament is to place before the public the information they deem necessary? By the Reports placed upon its tables, which the Court of Queen's Bench has decided you have no right to publish. Now, in this case, an intelligent commissioner was appointed to inquire into the state of a gaol. What did he discover in it? That in some ward or part of the prison, there were confined together a man of the worst possible description, a lad of seventeen years of age, and another who was only imprisoned for fourteen days, and whose offence, therefore, must have been trifling. In that room there was a book calculated to make the imprudent guilty, and him who was guilty, tenfold worse. Thus it was, that the commissioners found a prison converted from a place which ought to have been one for punishment—for true punishment and subsequent amendment — into a place in which those passions were inflamed, which had already proved too strong; and the mischief was increased even on the spot where it might be supposed that it would be permanently diminished. In that place there were four books, — I have procured a copy of one of them, — I cannot venture to produce it in this House; but it will be found in the library. And I now beg to refer the House to the letter of Dr. Bailey respecting that book, as that gentleman was asked to allow it to be dedicated to him. Dr. Bailey was told that it was a book of science, and, under that impression, he gave his consent. At the time when the work was published, it was without the worst plates; but when the third edition was brought out, all the objectionable parts appeared, and Dr. Bailey wrote that letter respecting it, expressing his strong feeling of indignation, and stating that about six years before Dr. Robertson had written a work, and, previous to its publication, had requested permission to dedicate it to him (Dr. Bailey). That he had consented to such request on condition that it should be published with the omission of certain passages. That a few days previous to the date of this letter, a friend of his had shown him a third edition of the work, in which there were many passages of the worst nature. That he could not express what he thought when he saw the obscenity of the work. Remembered that he had been requested to allow it to be dedicated to him. That, in his opinion, it was a work in gross violation of every principle of decency and decorum. For fear that the indecency of this book should not be disclosed soon enough, a new edition was published, with Dr. Bailey's letter added; and to that edition were also affixed certain plates, — which are up-stairs, — which, I venture to say, the most profligate had never seen surpassed, and than which no mind, however depraved, could imagine anything more gross. Such, Sir, was the book which was described to the jury as a scientific work, and for which they were to give 100*l.* damages.

The commissioners made a Report. What was to be done? Were they to keep this a secret? The libel, as it was called, was published. It was handed to the corporation of London, as they were in some degree affected by the statement. The corporation of London made a Report, contradicting some parts of the Report. No doubt the corporation believed fully the truth of that which they were induced to represent to the Government. Then it was the duty of the House to refer the statement of the corporation to the commissioner, in order that he might have the opportunity of giving an explanation. Thus it was that the First Report was made the subject of the first action, as the Second Report was made the subject of the second action. And yet Lord Denman asked what this had to do with the regulation of prisons? It might, indeed, rather be asked, what it had not to do with it? Was it not a part of the regulation of prisons well deserving of their attention? In what could the public feel more deeply interested than that a lad, who had fallen into temptation and crime, should not, by his confinement in one of their prisons, be rendered one of the worst of criminals? Was it not a part of the prison discipline, which they ought to know of, how individuals passed their term in gaol? — how the gaolers performed their duties? What belonged more to the discipline of a prison, than the amusements or the occupations of its inmates? But, first, Lord Denman said this did not relate to prison discipline; and, secondly, he said, even if it did, why give Mr. Stockdale's name? Now I, on the contrary, will ask what would be the value of the Report — what credit would be given to it, if the case were that of an anonymous person? Again, I ask, what justice would it be to a man to allow a report against his character to be circulated amongst 658 persons, — thus to give it every publicity, — and yet not to put it forth in such a manner as to give to the man no opportunity of meeting directly the criminality with which he was charged? I would beg to say, that much which has been said, and much which we have heard upon the subject, has been founded in error.

It has been said, may the House of Commons libel whom they please? What motive has the House of Commons to libel an individual? — what motive, I say, has this House to publish its Reports at all? Nothing but the public good. But, then, it has been said, in a case of libel, a man should not be left without a remedy. Now, from the little experience I have had in this House, I have no hesitation in saying, that if matters were published by us which should reflect upon the interests of any individual; I believe that if it were found that his interests had been undeservedly affected by them, if the individual so affected were to petition the House, praying for a committee, he would and must obtain practical justice from your hands. Supposing that an individual had, from information wrongfully given; or — supposing him wilfully to have — misled the House — why, could not the House commit him for doing so? This House will allow no witness, with impunity, to tell a falsehood to them, whether the person be on his oath or not. They will not permit an individual to libel, intentionally, another. But, supposing that the House of Commons had, for some public purpose, authorised a certain publication, and that, through its means, a party had suffered loss; — then, in that case, I am sure that the House would not refuse remuneration. I do not believe that a party injured by them would be left by you unredressed. I believe that it would be found that more strict justice would be done by this House than would be rendered, in such a case, by any court of law. I deny that the jurisdiction of this House is incompatible with justice; I believe that it would be more perfect and less encumbered with technicalities than the judgment of any court of law. Now, with respect to the question immediately before the House. An action having been brought against Mr. Hansard, he defended himself; the House took no part in it. What, then, was the first matter that occurred? In this case, the jury found that the publication was obscene, as it had been represented. Lord Denman summed up to jury in that case; he, too, declared that the book was obscene, as it had been represented. In that case, when an appeal was made upon the merits of the publication and of its publisher, a special jury of the county of Middlesex declared that the man who published such a work was entitled to nothing. And yet we are, here, charged with doing injustice, for having taken measures to prevent a man pocketing 100*l.*, — because we said — that which a jury afterwards declared — that he had published an obscene book. But this was a case which might have been decided upon its merits; and yet Lord Denman thought it to be his duty, in connection with it, to make a strong declaration with respect to the privileges of this House.

And now, Sir, with respect to Lord Denman, I will say that I do most firmly believe, if there be a man who is above courting popularity, or whose feelings could be uninfluenced by any improper or undue desire for it, Lord Denman is that man. I believe that Lord Denman is not insensible to public favour; but to be acceptable and grateful to his high mind, it must follow the honourable and faithful discharge of his public duty. Of his Lordship's honour and purity of motive I am certain. Most Honourable Members are aware of his Lordship's eloquence, — he is a man of strong and energetic mind, and he therefore expresses himself in strong terms. He spoke, for instance, of this House publishing libels. You have the declaration of the Noble Lord; but who are to be the judges of the fact? Is this House to have no authority in the publication of any matters whatever, which you may deem of importance for public purposes? What are you to do? Lord Denman's station and influence, — his acknowledged weight and experience in the administration of the law, — all lay claim to the highest attention; and you cannot pass by the first court of justice promulgating the opinion, that you publish matters without any just right or pretence. The Noble Lord necessarily called the attention of Parliament to the state of the law, and the committee which was appointed directed their attention to this case. The Honourable Member for Oxford says that the House has been misled by two Learned Members. Sir, I cannot doubt but that I am one of those who were thus alluded to; but who the other may be, I cannot imagine. For myself, I can say that this I did do, — I laboriously collected together all that I thought the committee ought to know; and I received the greatest possible assistance from the enlightened intelligence of many Honourable Members on both sides, and particularly from the Right Honourable Baronet opposite, and the Right Honourable the Member for Montgomeryshire, who is never absent upon any one occasion in which the maintenance of the privileges of this House, for the benefit of the public, is concerned. That which I collected I presented to the committee, and I certainly held out no inducement to them to come to particular resolutions. If the documents which I collected had not appeared to me to prove that the House possessed the privilege, which I am now convinced it has, I should most willingly have stated that to be the result of my labours.

This matter was well and closely sifted by the Right Honourable Baronet, by Sir William Follett, by Sir Frederick Pollock, and by the Attorney General; and I never submitted anything to the committee until it had first been considered out of the committee by those Learned Gentlemen. Sir W. Follett offered no suggestion from which I disagreed; and, so far was I from instructing others, that whatever I did was read over in my chambers by the Honourable and Learned Gentlemen who met me there. So far, then, was the committee from being misled by two Honourable Members, that no member of the committee could have been misled; and I must say that there was no diligence which was in my power to bestow upon the case, that I did not patiently and sedulously give to it. The Right Honourable Baronet softened many paragraphs in the Report, and added to it that most important paragraph, soliciting the House to pay great attention to, and bestow all caution in, the publication of their Reports. That Report was presented to the House; and I maintain that it will be found to be sustained by legal authority, even to its least point. I never stated anything in these resolutions for which there is not distinct authority to be found in almost every sentence. I feel most confident that, if the House were to go through them line by line, they would be found to be supported by the law and the constitution to the fullest extent. The Court of Queen's Bench has pronounced in favour of that which is the basis of parliamentary privilege, almost in the terms of that Report, — namely, that this House possesses privileges necessary to enforce the functions requisite for the discharge of its duties. And I would ask, what Honourable Member, having regard to the interests of the public, would contend for less than that? The Court of Queen's Bench proves that these privileges are possessed by the House, and that, when necessary, they can be lawfully exercised by the House. But to whom, and before whom, are you to establish that necessity? The whole question turns upon that point. The Court of Queen's Bench admits that you have the privileges. You must have them, when you have great public duties to discharge; but then it is idle to tell you that you have those privileges, when, at the same time, you have a judge to ask you, when the case for exercising them arises, "Where is the necessity?" Is it by you, or by others, the point is to be discussed as to the necessity for exercising your privileges? If you are to be told that you are all at liberty to do as you please, and to act without restraint, — if you can satisfy somebody else that there is a necessity for unlimited freedom, — that makes the thing at once a burlesque. It is admitted that the House has the power, if there be a necessity for its exercise; but, then, if the House is not to judge of that necessity, of how little use would the privilege be! The House and the judges agree on the one point; but the difference between the judges and the House arises as to who is to determine upon the point of necessity. Are you to have that point determined here, or by others who do not belong to the House? This House, when a Report was made to them, came to certain resolutions. Now, I must say, in connection with this matter, that I wish well to the present Government, although I am perfectly unconnected with it; and, feeling favourably towards it, I must remark that I do believe that the Government will suffer more—and I cannot help saying, not without some justice — from its abandonment, in this respect, of the highest public duty with which it is charged, than from anything else. I will not suffer myself to believe that Honourable Gentlemen opposite have acted, in this matter, with party intentions; but most certainly their proceedings have a strong party tendency, inasmuch as they have the effect of bringing down upon the Government a strong condemnation, and their arguments have been addressed to show that, in the hands of the present Administration, even the privileges of the House of Commons have deteriorated. The Government induced the House of Commons to adopt certain resolutions, pledging them to pursue a certain line of conduct; and then, having done this, they have held the Parliament up to contempt by declaring that its resolutions were not proper to be acted upon. Whatever might be the propriety of those resolutions, the Government now find themselves taunted with the charge that they dare not act upon them. An Honourable Friend (Mr. Wakley) near me observed, that, if the sheriff should be committed by us, he supposes his coroner will follow next.

For my own part, I would never pass a resolution by way of threat; I would rather, in the terms of my resolution, fall short of what I intended. But when I had once resolved, I would execute. I ask, Sir, is it fitting or decorous that this House should stand before the public eye in the position of interfering with the administration of justice? What reliance can you expect will be placed upon any resolution you may now pass? Sir, I do hope this question will be considered and decided with the utmost calmness and deliberation; for if there be any assembly which ought not to be swayed by passion, or influenced by the least feeling of displeasure, — if there be an assembly whose power and authority should be enforced without acrimony and resentment, — Parliament is that assembly. But, having deliberately resolved, let the House fearlessly discharge its duty. The public mind has been much abused upon this subject; but, then, how are you to expect to have the public with you, when it is understood that you have abandoned your own resolutions? You say, that this privilege is necessary to the performance of your duty; you place your character before the world on the truth of that declaration; you are called upon to act, and you flinch; you dare not follow up your own resolution.

Sir, I agree in every word that has been said with respect to public opinion constituting the power and the strength of this House. But public opinion is often, for a short time, mistaken. Those who honestly discharge their duty must be prepared to stand, for a given period, the brunt of popular opinion. But allow me to say that it is this House which has misled public opinion. If you had performed that which I — and I say it with all humility and respect — thought was your duty, — if you had shown confidence in your own resolution, — if you had not exhibited a wavering mind to the public, — if you had not so conducted yourselves as to induce the belief that you were afraid of your own act, and had fallen into vacillation and uncertainty, — I firmly believe that the public mind would have been in your favour. I do think, if any other Parliament had acted with a timidity like that displayed on the present occasion by this House,—and I say it with all due respect, — that the privileges of Parliament would have been destroyed. The Right Honourable Baronet has read a part of his own speech, in which he recommended the proper course to be adopted; and here I may take the opportunity of observing that there is a report of what I said, on that occasion, in the same Mirror of Parliament, which, however, imputes to me expressions that I never used, and language which I utterly disclaim. What I did say, I believe, was, that I could not entirely concur with my Honourable and Learned Friend the Attorney General. I think I said that my impression, with respect to the proposed course, was different from that of my Honourable and Learned Friend. It is the tendency of all tribunals to extend their jurisdiction; and there are no tribunals which have extended their jurisdiction so much as the courts of justice. The courts of justice have, in fact, repealed the Acts of Parliament. The courts of law in Westminster have extended their jurisdiction; and, now, here is something to show that they desire to be compared with the House of Commons — the paramount power. The question, then, is this; — is the House of Commons or are the courts at Westminster to be the paramount power of the state?

Sir, what is the foundation of the prosperity of this country, and of the authority of Parliament? It is the high character which this House maintains: it is, that it is looked up to as the first tribunal in the state, superintending, correcting, and restraining all others. This it is that gives the House authority—that makes it a terror, not only to the law, but to all public officers;—and it is of this, that an attempt is now made to deprive it. I say that without this power you never can fill your situation as you have hitherto done, or be so useful and beneficial to the country. The question, therefore, is, whether it is true that Parliament has always been thought a paramount power of the state, and competent to form its own judgment with respect to the extent of its privileges? Is this proposition admitted, or is it not? In consequence of the House having passed the previous resolution, the Attorney General stood in a peculiar situation. I, on that occasion, expressed what I felt, and ventured to advise the House to proceed either by commitment, or to require the Speaker to write to the judges on the subject. The latter I knew to be an irregular course; and I was aware that the judges were not bound to take notice of such a communication; but I thought it likely to lead to less evils than some others, to which I shall presently advert. Nevertheless, though I differ from my Honourable and Learned Friend as to the step which was subsequently taken, and recommended a different course, still I cannot say that my Honourable and Learned Friend did wrong, as Attorney General. My Honourable and Learned Friend had precedents before him, and had a straightforward legal course to pursue. Under these circumstances, the language I have just heard from the other side of the House has greatly astonished me. Does not my Honourable and Learned Friend opposite (Mr. Pemberton) know—nay, he must know—that no other course could be taken to stop the action than that which was adopted? The Honourable and Learned Gentleman says that the defendant invited the plaintiff into Westminster Hall. There is scarcely a word or sentence in the Honourable and Learned Gentleman's argument which will not, when exposed, be found destitute of sound argument. Mr. Hansard, forsooth, sent a card of invitation to the plaintiff to meet him in Westminster Hall! Why, Mr. Hansard was dragged there as defendant, against his will. Does the Honourable and Learned Gentleman mean, by "invitation," that Mr. Hansard did more than was necessary to answer the call made upon him by the process of the court? If the Honourable and Learned Gentleman do not mean that, what does he intend to imply by the word "invitation?" The defendant, at every step of the proceeding, protested against the jurisdiction of the court; and yet it is said that the very stones of Westminster Hall will cry out, unless Mr. Hansard, after keeping Stockdale at arm's length throughout the proceedings, now pays the damages which the jury have awarded without further dispute. The House was aware of the intention to plead; they heard it repeated over and over again, that the action could not be stopped except by the plea; and how can it now be said that the plea in this case was an invitation to the plaintiff? If it was an invitation at all, it was an invitation to be off.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and laughter.]

The course taken by my Honourable and Learned Friend the Attorney General was a strictly legal course; there is not the slightest pretence for saying that he conceded one jot; and I was so astonished to hear what was said in the committee on this subject, that I thought it right to move an amendment, declaring that the steps which had been taken by the Attorney General had no tendency to restrict the privileges of the House. It will be recollected that Lord Chief Justice Pemberton and Mr. Justice Jones defended their conduct in the case of Jay v. Topham, one of the sergeants-at-arms, because there was no plea similar to that which has been given in this case of Stockdale v. Hansard. Lord Chief Justice Pemberton, when brought to the bar of the House of Commons, distinctly affirmed that an order of the House was pleadable in bar to any action for an arrest under it; and also that this House was a superior court of a higher nature than the King's Bench, and of greater authority, and that the King's Bench had nothing to do to inspect the actions of this House; and disclaimed the court having questioned the legality of the order or the power, but only whether the party had properly pursued the order. Sir T. Jones said,—

If the defendant had produced a copy of the Journal, that would have been sufficient; no judge would have been so silly, or imprudent, at least, to have said that had not been a good and sufficient authority.

After reading these observations, can any man say that the defendant, pleading in her that the action complained of was done under legal authority, did anything which amounted to a concession of the jurisdiction of the court? As I before said, I expressed, at the time, my strong disapprobation of the course pursued by the House, and I suggested another, — not strictly legal, but which was not illegal, — for the purpose of avoiding greater evils. Therefore, so far as my authority was concerned, the Government knew what was the probable consequence of the step they determined on. It is now said, that the question has been argued in a court of law; that the House has taken the chance of the judgment of the court being in its favour; and that, finding the judgment adverse, they complain, and seek to resist. But what party can be before a tribunal, and not look for judgment in his favour? What pretence is there for saying that, in this, the House is acting like a dishonest gamester, who, having played for and lost a stake, refuses to pay it? What colour is there for saying, when the House has resisted to the utmost, that, having used legal means without success, they now refuse to submit? And yet this is what the stones of Westminster Hall are to cry out about! I only regret that more opportunity has not been afforded to the Right Honourable Baronet opposite to consider this part of the question, for I am certain that the Right Honourable Baronet's intelligent mind would soon have been disabused of the grossest fallacy which has ever fallen under my notice. There has not been, from the beginning to the end, the slightest departure from hostility to the jurisdiction of the court. No concession of any sort or kind has been made; and the House is now in as good a situation to resist, by any means in its power, as if it had let judgment go by default. Undoubtedly there were reasons in favour of the course pursued by the Attorney General; but these were not such as would have induced my Honourable and Learned Friend to adopt it, supposing he had taken the same view of the matter as I did. It is true, as my Honourable and Learned Friend has said, that if the court had given judgment in its favour, no one would have disapproved of the step he took. My Honourable and Learned Friend opposite (Mr. Pemberton), at one time, thought that no privilege of the House was good which had not existed from the time of Richard I., and I do not know whether the opinion of Lord Ellenborough and of Mr. Justice Patteson has yet satisfied him of the contrary. I beg, in order to fortify the statements I have made, to be allowed to read the opinions of Mr. Perceval, Chancellor of the Exchequer, Sir V. Gibbs, Attorney General, and Mr. Ponsonby, as to the effect of appearing and pleading in the case of Burdett v. Abbott. The Attorney General said, —

> The House was the sole and ultimate judge of its own privileges, and of their extent. They were to be judged by this House alone. No other body had the power to decide. Not but that their privileges might be incidentally brought before another court, — which court, however, could not look to their privileges, but to their decisions upon them. It was by these that the court would be bound to decide. He felt not a doubt but that the judge, on reading the Speaker's plea, would refuse to listen to the action; but he could not feel the same assurance as to the plea of the sergeant, because there might be a doubt whether he had or had not overstepped his lawful authority in the manner of executing the warrant.

Now, I would ask the House to forget, for a moment, that those opinions were delivered by Sir V. Gibbs, and suppose that they were delivered by the present Attorney General. This shows the necessity of the plea; it shows that an act, which might be done with the authority of the House, might be improperly done by the party authorised by the House to perform it. Mr. Ponsonby said, —

> Yet, monstrous as it appeared to some, and novel as it must seem to all, it was his firm persuasion that the Speaker ought to appear, and put in his plea to the action. Such course was open to him without the slightest apprehension of his surrendering in the remotest degree the privileges of that House; and such course the House could adopt, although it had determined to commit the solicitor . . . . for, unless such a course was adopted, how was it possible for the courts below to be apprised of the nature of the case? How was it possible for them to inform themselves of those facts, without the knowledge of which they could not know whether the injury complained of was committed in a private or public capacity?

Mr. Perceval said, —

> He was confident that no authority, no judge in the land, when he learned that it was a question in which the privileges of the House of Commons were implicated, would determine upon it. He entertained no apprehension that either the dignity or privilege of the House of Commons was endangered.

Such were the opinions of different politicians and lawyers of great eminence, following up the opinions of Lord Chief Justice Pemberton and Mr. Justice Jones. I recommended that the Attorney General should not resist the case in a court of law at all: but as I did not succeed in preventing my Honourable and Learned Friend from pleading, I was anxious to give to the proceeding as little of a marked character as possible; and I therefore advised my Honourable and Learned Friend not to argue, but merely to inform the court of the privilege of the House, and there leave the matter. My Honourable and Learned Friend opposite says that the House appeared and prayed for judgment. The House must see what injustice is done the Attorney General by such a statement. When he was dragged to the trial of the case, what else could he do but pray for judgment? Let the House read the opinion of Lord Denman, with respect to the line of argument pursued by the Attorney General, and they will see that the Honourable and Learned Gentleman was not at all indistinct in his protests against the jurisdiction of the court. Several times in the course of his judgment, Lord Denman observed, "that the Attorney General argued that the defendant had acted by order of the House of Commons, and that, therefore, the court had nothing to do but to give judgment for the defendant;" and this the Learned Lord repeated five or six times, distinctly recognising the protest of the Attorney General. Consequently, the Attorney General's appearance in support of the plea is not to be taken as an admission — which, in truth, it was not — of the jurisdiction of the court, because he appeared precisely to protest against it. What was the defence? A person, appointed by the House, had performed a certain act, for which he was proceeded against; and his defence was, that he had acted under authority superior to that before which he was cited. And if the court, in spite of that defence, decided against him, does that prove an admission of the jurisdiction of that court over the authority by virtue of which the act was performed? Does that preclude his applying for any collateral remedy? The man did not voluntarily place himself in the situation of a defendant in the Court of Queen's Bench. Then what I disapprove of is, that the Noble Lord should urge the special circumstances as the ground for taking the course proposed. I, and my Honourable and Learned Friends who take the same view of the case as I do, can see no special circumstances which can justify the adoption of the course proposed in the Noble Lord's resolution, — that is, without stultifying its former decision. I admit that an observation has been made, which is entitled to the greatest respect. It has been said that public opinion may be against the House. What then? Are you prepared to surrender the privileges of the House? Now, mark what you have done. You passed resolutions before the action; you passed resolutions after the action. Still the plaintiff goes on, in spite of your resolutions, and in contempt of your authority. You resist by all legal means, not allowing a word to drop admitting the jurisdiction of the court in which the action was brought. However, the court decide against you, and the plaintiff persists in seeking damages. Now, what special circumstances, what changes, have since occurred to induce you to swerve from the course you originally pointed out? I know of none. The only special circumstance I am aware of is this, — that Mr. Stockdale has proved himself most specially contumacious. Has Stockdale ever been led to believe, as the Right Honourable and Learned Member for Ripon has said, that this House was inviting him on? By what means did the House lead him on? By telling him that the Court of Queen's Bench had no jurisdiction, and that this House itself was sole and supreme judge of its own privileges. And yet we are now assured there are special circumstances. I say there are none, except special contumacy on the one part, and special timidity on the other.

Why do you hesitate? You will never have a case in which a man can act so contumaciously as this man has done. Nor can you have a case in which you can avoid pleading, if you allow yourselves to be driven to it. Suppose commitment were advised, — who is the party? Why, a man whom it were much below the dignity of Parliament to commit, unless for the mere purpose of vindicating its privileges. In this case, the best thing that could happen to Stockdale, would be for you to commit him. You would create sympathy for him in the public mind; he would be held as a martyr, and it would be as good as half a fortune to him. I, then, would not advise the House to adopt that course. I say, do not take any step that is not required by the absolute, unavoidable necessity of the case. If the course I have recommended, therefore, do not appear clearly and indispensably necessary, I trust you will not follow it. It is with these views that I moved the amendment which appears in the record of the proceedings of the committee, — believing that I should have the support of the Noble Lord below me and the Right Honourable Baronet opposite. But when I found myself disappointed in that expectation, I at once gave up the point. If the House is to resist, let it do so with dignity and with effect. Let the House, if it so decide, act with firmness and consistency; but do not let us go into a contest to expose ourselves to defeat and contempt. I say, then, resist, — that is, if the great majority of the House go with me in my opinion, — resist to the uttermost; — calmly, but firmly, adopt that course, and follow it out with becoming dignity; but do not attempt it, — abandon it without hesitation, if to do so be to produce a division in the House, and thus, by adopting it by less than an overwhelming majority, you are to appear in a weakened and less powerful position. The course which you ought to pursue must depend chiefly upon the state of opinion in the House. I think, however, that it would not be found that this poor and much commiserated sheriff would endure such very great sufferings as have been depicted. And this much I must say, — that if you are prepared, on all occasions, to give way to such considerations, and to allow yourselves to be influenced by motives of pity for subordinate officers, and to give up to the judges at once, you will speedily deprive yourselves of the means necessary to vindicate the privileges of Parliament. Supposing the House were to adopt the amendment; the sheriff would be served with a copy of the resolution, — and if he acted prudently, he would come to the House and state that he had received the resolution. The House would tell him not to execute the writ of the court, and would, at the same time, tell the sergeant-at-arms that if the sheriff called on him for protection, he should claim the aid of all such civil power as might be necessary. I presume that the Home Secretary would then receive instructions from the House to give his assistance to this effect.

Honourable Members laugh; but do they not recollect that the soldiers were called out when Sir F. Burdett was arrested? How do those who laugh intend to support the authority of the House, when those storms, which are now foreseen at a distance, burst over our heads? When such orders as I have alluded to are once given, the courts of Westminster will be powerless as against the House of Commons. I say now, that if this advice should be adopted, I will stand responsible for the result. What power would the Court of Queen's Bench have? The judges might grant an attachment against the sheriff; but when their officer came to execute their writ, he would find it was like taking the bear, — the bear would take him. What, under these circumstances, must be done? In the present state of the country, it is impossible that the high authorities of the state could engage in a conflict of force; and the Court of Queen's Bench would probably take one of two courses. They would either apply to the House of Lords, or address the Crown through the medium of the Home Secretary. If the latter, then the Crown, seeing that a case of privilege was staying the ordinary process of law, would desire the wisdom of both Houses to take the matter into consideration. This would lead to a conference of the two Houses. Should the sheriff dare to execute the writ, the same consequences would follow. If the House of Lords should refuse to come to some adjustment on the question, the House of Commons would have but one step to take, — and it would not be a step of violence; this would be, to resolve that such and such a privilege was necessary to the due execution of their functions, and that they were determined, until the affair should be settled, not to go on with public business. If I were asked what would happen if the two Houses should continue to disagree? my reply is, that that is a consequence which might meet us at every turn of our parliamentary duties. The Houses have already been divided in opinion more than once; I hope they never will be so again; but, at the same time, the only constitutional mode of discussing disputed questions of privilege is by conference between the two Houses. Neither House questions the privileges of the other; but both this House and the Lords would feel that the public interest was at stake, and that such a matter should not remain without adjustment; and that all opportunity of conflict between the Parliament and the regular legal tribunals of the country should be, as far as possible, removed. Now, if Honourable Members are not content to pursue this course, how do they propose to vindicate the privileges of the House? Let any man suggest a course less likely to produce public mischief, or more calculated to establish and preserve peace and good understanding, and it shall have my most attentive consideration. First of all, I set out with this proposition, — that the House of Commons, as an essential part of the constitution, must possess the power necessary to enable it to discharge its functions. Then, much has been said about writs of error lying to the House of Lords. Now, I maintain that there is no such thing. It is an entire mistake; there is a writ of error to Parliament, but not to the House of Lords. Originally the court of Parliament consisted of one House; and when the Lords and the Commons met together, they must have been possessed of powers necessary to enable them to discharge their functions. The two Houses afterwards separated, and it is not very certain for what cause. It is supposed by some, that the Lords revealed what the conduct of the Commons had been on the subject of subsidies, and so exposed them to the anger of the King, and that therefore the Commons refused to sit with the Lords any longer. Lord Ellenborough, however, has laid it down, that when the two Houses separated, each House took with it all the powers necessary to enable it to discharge its functions. He says,—

> The privileges which have been since the separation in 49 Henry III. enjoyed, and the functions which have been since uniformly exercised by each branch of the Legislature, with the knowledge and acquiescence of the other House and of the King, must be presumed to be the privileges and functions which then—that is, at the very period of their original separation—were statutably assigned to each. The privileges which belong to them seem at all times to have been, and necessarily must be, inherent in them, independent of any precedent.

With respect to the power of the courts of justice to control Parliament, their hands are purer now, but they are not stronger, than they were before. If the courts of law have, now, the power to control the privileges of Parliament, they had it in the worst of times. Each House, then, being part of the High Court of Parliament, every writ of error that pronounces judgment upon the House of Commons the House of Lords is a party to, because this House is part of the Parliament. Lord Holt himself, in the case of "Ashby v. White," makes use of this fact, not very fairly, against the Commons,—asking how the Commons could object to a writ of error, when they were parties to the judgment which must be given upon the writ of error? Several cases will be found on the Rolls of Parliament in which the Commons are described as parties; and there are, also, several cases in which the Commons have complained that they were omitted; and as to those cases, it has been said that it is impossible to ascertain, with any certainty, whether the Commons were parties to the record or not,—the clerk of the House of Lords having omitted their names, sometimes by mistake, and sometimes by design, in order to give the greater semblance of authority to the House to which he belonged. The House of Commons, then, is co-ordinate in point of privileges with the House of Lords; and are we, by a side wind, to make the House of Lords paramount? Is the House of Commons to become subservient to the House of Lords,—subservient, I mean, by being subject to their jurisdiction? The country made a great struggle to carry the Reform Bill;—one object, if not the main purpose, of which was, to put the House in its proper position, as representing the people, and to free it from the influence of the Lords. But I do not hesitate to say that the extraordinary exertions which were made in carrying that measure would be entirely lost, and that the Reform Bill would be nothing better than a piece of waste paper, if it were allowed to the House of Lords to exercise a control over our privileges; if this were so, the Lords would have acquired, by the Reform Bill, a greater power over you than they ever before possessed. The effect, then, of allowing your privileges to be revised by writ of error from the Queen's Bench to the House of Lords would be, to submit the decision of those privileges to one branch of the Legislature, which is only co-equal and co-ordinate with you, in point of authority, in respect of privilege. And what is the constitutional ground for this? The danger of abuse. It is said that, if you have the power to decide upon your own privileges, you may declare anything to be privilege; on the other hand, I say that the Court of Queen's Bench might declare anything not to be privilege. The Queen's Bench has grasped at every inch of jurisdiction in former years. The history of the country shows each tribunal constantly contending for the possession of unallowed and extended jurisdiction; and Chief Justice Pemberton told Lord North, that he had made more law—in his day—than King, Lords, and Commons all put together. It is well known to those who are in the habit of reasoning on jurisprudence, that there must be, somewhere in the state, a paramount power; and that that paramount power, wherever it may be placed, may be abused. Abuse is incident to all human institutions; but it is said the abuse of power is checked by public opinion. Then, Sir, I should be glad to know what jurisdiction is more amenable to public opinion than this House? It may be said that this House, by possessing this power uncontrolled, is, so far as its privileges are concerned, a Parliament in itself; and that it assumes a power beyond that of any other estate of the realm. I contend, however, that there is not one single privilege claimed by this House, which has not its corresponding privilege in the House of Lords. It is said that the House has already been guilty of abuse of power. I admit such to be the fact. The House has, no doubt, on certain occasions, been guilty of abuse of power. And what tribunal, I again ask, can be named, which has not, on some occasions, committed an abuse of power? But, at the same time, it is my duty to mention, — to bring under the notice of the House, — the fact, that many of these acts, now viewed as abuses, were, at the time when they took place, clear and undeniable privileges of Parliament.

Mr. WYNN. — Hear, hear!

Mr. SERJEANT WILDE. — In the early days of Parliament, it must be remembered, that society was in a very different state from what it has obtained at the present day, and it was necessary to assert a very different kind of privileges. Some of these privileges were preserved, no doubt, long after the change in civilisation had rendered their preservation useless and improper. They were maintained, in short, after the necessity for their existence no longer remained. I would not keep up a single privilege that was not requisite for the preservation of the dignity and legislative power of the House; for I hold it to be a principle of law, that if the necessity for any particular privilege were to cease to-morrow, as a public benefit, the privilege itself would no longer exist. I believe that, by departing from that principle, abuses may have been committed. But, with respect to the power of this House, we all know that some of the most eminent persons, whose names are on record, — eminent counsel and learned judges, — have been committed for breach of privilege: let me ask how it was that no one of those persons, who could not, however, have been ignorant of the law, ever applied — (but that, in all cases, they yielded obedience to the House) — for a habeas corpus to discharge him? It is true they had not the advantage of the law of my Honourable and Learned Friend over the way; but if the House had not the power it assumed, it is difficult to understand how so many eminent lawyers can have submitted to it. Now, I say that the very fact of the obedience so yielded on the part of those persons, is a proof that this House was not overstepping its privilege in committing them; for the greater the abuse of the privilege, the greater is the probability of resistance, and the less likely is it to be submitted to.

With regard to abuse of privileges, I may be allowed to point out a great difference which exists between what may be considered as an abuse of privilege by this House, and excess of jurisdiction by courts of law. This House remedies those abuses of itself; there is no other power to put them down. And the integrity and good sense of this House, in the discharge of its duty, has induced it to give up privilege after privilege, when it was found that their continuance was not necessary. I must now refer to some of the cases that have been so much relied on in the pleadings, and which, I believe, counsel would hardly be allowed to cite in any other cause — especially the case of "Benyon v. Evelyn," which was supposed to show that there was a general jurisdiction in the courts of law to examine and overrule what was done by the authority of Parliament. Now, I must say that all the argument upon this case of "Benyon v. Evelyn" was extrajudicial; for, in that case, as was distinctly shown by my Honourable and Learned Friend the Attorney General, no privilege of a Member of Parliament or of the House was affected. It was an attempt, in short, by a creditor, to force the parliamentary privilege on a defendant who had been a Member of Parliament, and who, to an action of debt, had pleaded the Statute of Limitations. The plaintiff demurred to that plea, on the ground that the defendant was a Member of Parliament, and therefore could not be sued. The judgment in that case was pronounced by Sir Orlando Bridgman, — a great loyalist, who had been expelled from Parliament, but was then Chief Justice of the Court of King's Bench. He had been one of the commissioners who treated for Charles I. at Uxbridge, and was made a judge two days after the landing of Charles II., and then he came red-hot against the Parliament with that judgment. This is one case which has been relied on, in support of the power assumed by the courts of law. I warn the House that the step they are now about to take will form a lasting precedent. I will show what has been the result of forbearance in former cases, when you have not been called upon, or have not thought proper to act. In this very case of Benyon and Evelyn, as far as the matter of privilege was concerned, the judgment was in favour of the Member. The privilege was actually forced on him by the Court of King's Bench. The judgment, then, being in favour of Parliament, the House had no ground for interference; therefore, all that has been said upon this subject is, as my Honourable and Learned Friend the Attorney General contended, extra-judicial, and the remarks of the judges upon it are of no value as against Parliament, for, if the case applies at all, it must be to confirm the privilege. Undoubtedly Parliament would have interfered if the judgment had not been held to be good parliamentary law; and, because they did not, the Court of Queen's Bench actually treat the acquiescence, as they call it, of this House, in the judgment of Benyon and Evelyn, as authority against its privileges! I was never more surprised in my life than when I read, in this judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, that the non-interference of the House, in the cases cited, must be taken as authority against its privileges! Why, to many of those cases the House was no party. I venture to say that some of them occurred when the Parliament was not even sitting. The House could not interfere in an incidental case of which they, perhaps, never heard. But, if abuse be a ground of the judgment of the court against the House, let us see how the case stands. If abuses have existed, the House has applied the remedy; but the course taken by the Queen's Bench would tend to negative all inquiry, and prevent all necessary cure by Parliament: the abuses that have been complained against are no longer insisted on, —Parliament has cured them itself, —and necessarily so, for an abuse of privilege cannot be maintained. Who ever heard of a "legitimate abuse"? And it is not removing an abuse to change the name.

But how stands the case with respect to the House of Lords? Suppose they vote a privilege, and a person is committed, or some other proceeding taken, for a violation of that privilege; the party brings his action, and the Court of Queen's Bench decides that the alleged privilege is no privilege, and then the party is entitled to a verdict. You appeal against that decision — How? By a writ of error, which brings you back to the very court that claims the privilege. The House of Lords would maintain the privilege which they had at first asserted; and it is absurd to say that you should begin a question in one court, that you should travel with it into another court, and that ultimately it should come back to the same court in which it first originated. What is the difference between the House of Lords and the House of Commons, on this point, in law? In my opinion, there is none. Here the Houses are co-ordinate. Hear the language of Mr. Chief Baron Gilbert: — "The House of Commons is intended as a check to the House of Lords." But what a farce would it be if the House of Lords could check the Commons; and if, when the two Houses are co-ordinate and independent of each other, one could so treat the other! It is, of course, necessary, that the House of Lords should have the same power of privilege as the House of Commons. And is not that power liable to abuse in that House as well as in this? The House of Lords is not superior in this respect to the Commons, and is as liable to abuse its powers. The law is framed upon the supposition that there can be no abuse without a remedy; but what remedy have you against abuse of privilege in the House of Lords, except in itself? Then, when it is put forth as the only ground of claim on the part of the court, that this House is liable to abuse its powers, it is to say that the Commons of England, who are sent here by their constituents, who are acting in public and for the public, are not to be trusted with this power, which the House of Lords possesses, of deciding upon its own privileges, for fear of abuse. No one, however, must dream of abuse on the part of the Court of Queen's Bench; and yet the charge of liability to abuse might, with even more reason, be made against this appellant power which now seeks to control you. The Court of Queen's Bench heard the argument of my Honourable and Learned Friend, replete as it was with sound sense, and containing a mass of high legal authority; and yet the only comment which my Lord Denman thought it necessary to make upon it was, that it was "laboured." I cannot help observing, that having read the judgment, —with all the respect which I bear for the four learned judges who pronounced it, than whom more honourable and more amiable men were never, I believe, under any circumstances, associated together, —I do feel considerable surprise at finding an impression on my mind that the judgment was determined on before the argument was closed. The court did not give itself time to consider all the arguments. Lord Denman said of the reasons given by Chief Justice Holt, that "it was easier to outvote than to answer them;" and I beg the attention of the House on this point, to the observation to which I have referred, respecting my Learned Friend's argument. I think that it is much more easy to give a loose general judgment, bearing some popular topics on the face of it, than to bring forward any legal authorities on which a judgment could be given against this House. I will shortly call the attention of the House to some of the authorities which exist on this subject. The Right Honourable Baronet opposite will, doubtless, recollect many of them. Lord Chief Justice Abbott has declared "that it was settled by many precedents in the courts of law;" and, finally, in the case of Burdett and Abbott, that "it was competent for the House of Commons to convict for contempt of their privileges, and that they were the judges, and the only judges, of what was a contempt. The cases of Lord Shaftesbury, and of The King and Patys are decisive authorities to show that the courts of Westminster Hall cannot judge of any law, custom, or usage of Parliament; and, consequently, they cannot discharge a person committed for contempt of Parliament. The power of commitment for contempt is incident to every court of justice, and more especially it belongs to the High Court of Parliament," — (he was speaking of the House of Commons, but in truth each branch of the Legislature is a court for these purposes,) — "and therefore it is incompetent for this court to question the privileges of the House of Commons, on a commitment for an offence which they have adjudged to be a contempt of those privileges." That was the judgment of Lord Tenterden, delivered a few years ago. Lord Kenyon has expressly said that it was impossible to admit that the proceedings of either House of Parliament could be a libel. "This," said he, "is a proceeding on the part of one branch of the Legislature, and therefore we cannot inquire into it." Mr. Justice Laurence held, that "the proceedings of courts of justice are daily published, some of which highly reflect on individuals. Yet it is of vast importance to the public that the proceedings of courts of justice should be universally known. The general advantage to the country in having these proceedings made public, more than counterbalances the inconveniences to the private persons whose conduct may be the subject of such proceedings. The same reasons also apply to the proceedings in Parliament; it is of advantage to the public, and even to the legislative bodies, that true accounts of their proceedings should be generally circulated; and they would be deprived of that advantage if no person could publish their proceedings without being punished as a libeller."

I will next read the judgment of Lord Camden in the case of Entick v. Carrington. Lord Camden said, "The rights of that assembly (the House of Commons) are original and self-created; they are paramount to our jurisdiction; and they are above the reach of prohibitions, injunctions, or error," — meaning thereby any writ of error. I will now refer to the judgment of Chief Justice De Grey, which was passed by, in this present judgment, with scarcely an observation; and as for answer, there was none: —

> When the House of Commons has adjudged anything to be a contempt or a breach of privilege, their adjudication is a conviction, and their commitment in consequence, is execution; and no court can discharge or bail a person that is in execution by the judgment of any other court. We do not know, certainly, the jurisdiction of the House of Commons; we cannot judge of the laws and privileges of the House, because we have no knowledge of those laws and privileges.

Lord Denman said to this, — "You say that we do not know the law of Parliament: what better means of knowledge have you?" Why, when the judges say that they do not know the law of Parliament, what they say is — that they are judges to decide the common law; that their books are addressed to the common law, and not to matters of parliamentary law; and therefore that parliamentary law is not the law that they, as common law judges, know. The same thing would be said by judges who were most profoundly learned in parliamentary law; and they would say it all the more, and all the more properly, because they were so profoundly learned in parliamentary law. What if the Court of Queen's Bench should not know where Dublin was? And yet there was a case in which the court held, that they did not know that Dublin was in Ireland; it was not averred, and, therefore, they did not know it; but is it to be supposed that the judges did not really know that Dublin was in Ireland? But they did not know it, judicially. To the courts of law, parliamentary law is like foreign law; and how do the courts administer foreign law? They require evidence. I am surprised, therefore, that great lawyers should not be aware that when the judges say they do not know parliamentary law, the obvious meaning is, that they come to courts of common law to administer the common law, and that they will not decide on other matters not within their judicial knowledge. This was the manner in which the subject was dealt with in Thorpe's case, when the assembled judges were called before the House of Lords, and they declared that "relative to the law of Parliament they could give no opinion." They did not mean that they were ignorant of the law, but that they had no jurisdiction in such matters. Mr. Justice Holroyd said that all that was meant was, that they could not give a judgment in a matter before the House of Lords; and the error of Mr. Justice Holroyd was at once corrected. The Court of Queen's Bench adopted the error of Mr. Justice Holroyd, and got rid of the decision. Chief Justice De Grey said further,—

> There are two sorts of privileges, which ought never to be confounded; personal privilege, and the privilege belonging to the whole collective body of that assembly. Courts of justice have no cognizance of the acts of the Houses of Parliament, because they belong ad aliud examen.

And Mr. Justice Gould added,—

> This court cannot know the nature and power of the proceedings of the House of Commons; it is founded on a different law; the lex et consuetudo Parliamenti is known to Parliament men only. The House of Commons are the only judges of their own privileges.

To the opinion of Mr. Justice Blackstone I would direct the particular attention of those Honourable Gentlemen who have read the judgment, — because I wish to show how summarily this high authority, who devoted so much time and attention to the higher branches of the law, disposes of the question. He says,—

> The House of Commons is a supreme court, and they are judges of their own privileges and contempts; and if any persons may be safely trusted with this power, they must surely be the Commons, who are chosen by the people, for their privileges and powers are the privileges and powers of the people.

I call the attention of the House to the opinion of Blackstone, because he was a man connected with the aristocracy and the power of that day, and it is well known that he took an active part in the Middlesex election; and he says, that "the House of Commons is the only judge of its own proceedings;" and, further, "it is our duty to presume that the orders of that House and their execution are according to law." I will not weary the House with citing further judgments of the many learned judges who have pronounced opinions to the same effect; they have all been swept away in a few sentences in this last judgment of the court. Lord Denman said that his learned friend had admitted that the court had an incidental jurisdiction; but stated that he had some difficulty in understanding the Report of the House on the subject, which says that the judges have no direct power to decide upon the privileges of the House; but, when they come before them incidentally, they must dispose of them. The Report says it is difficult to understand the law the judges lay down, as to the difference between direct and indirect jurisdiction; but whether it be incidental or not, they can have no jurisdiction inconsistent with the authority of Parliament. I could have wished this opinion had been more clearly expressed,—it might then have been understood. I believe there is no difficulty in the present case. Suppose an action to be brought in one of the courts at Westminster for the seizure of a ship, and it should be pleaded that she was a prize of war; the moment that plea was put in there would be an end to the jurisdiction of the court; the question of the prize would have to be decided in another court; but when the Prize Court had decided, it would be competent for the court in which the action was brought to give effect to such judgment. Again, suppose a husband to sue in right of his wife; a question might arise whether the marriage was lawful; the bishop would then be appealed to, to certify whether the marriage was lawful, or not. That is the incidental jurisdiction. So, in many cases, there may be an incidental power to determine something beyond the jurisdiction of the court. My Learned Friend, in the course of his argument, cited a score of cases at the least, in which the judgment of the court of peculiar jurisdiction was declared to be binding on the court of incidental jurisdiction; but the whole of this part of the argument was passed by in the judgment with scarcely a single remark. The question, however, is, whether the House is satisfied with this judgment? and if not, what is the House to do? If there be any special circumstances in the present case, justifying the course proposed by the Noble Lord, let them be stated; but let us not damage our cause by the use of general words, which, in after ages, will go for nothing. I call upon the Noble Lord who has moved this resolution, to state the special circumstances upon which that resolution proceeds. I believe there are none; and I defy him to point out one special circumstance which shall not tend to a conclusion directly opposite to that at which he has arrived. You may say that you have pleaded; that you have argued; that you have taken the chance of the decision of the judges; and, if it be the Noble Lord's pleasure, that public opinion is against him. I allow that public opinion may be against him; but the House may rest satisfied that public opinion will still more strongly condemn our proceedings, if we fail to pursue a straightforward, manly, and vigorous course. Can you ever hope to be in a more favourable position for adopting such a course than you now are? Can you aver the existence of the privilege more distinctly than you have done? and are you now to come to a resolution that you do not, now, assent to the resolutions which you formerly passed? If you proceed no further, — if you stop where you are, and if you adopt the proposition of the Noble Lord, will it not appear that the Noble Lord has some occasion — some reason — to correct the opinion of the House on the subject of that resolution? And what would be the effect of such a proceeding? Would it not be to lower the House in the estimation of the country, and to embolden the courts to take further proceedings? Why hesitate? You require more time to examine. Examine what? For my own part, I regret that so much time was lost in the committee. But what further search do you want? Is there any doubt? If there is, admit it. I am ready, and earnest in this cause. If the resolutions of 1837 were wrong, let the House at once go back. If you have asserted more than you can safely act upon, I say you will consult the honour and dignity of the House much better by at once discharging the resolution. Let us proceed no further in a wrong course; — but do not act inconsistently, by continuing resolutions on your Journals, which you are afraid to enforce. Do not keep up a face of determination before the country, when you show, by your hesitation, that you doubt the rectitude of your own conduct? What evidence have you that public opinion is against you? and what have you done to lose the favour of the people? You did not commence the war against this wretched man, Stockdale; you were forced into the conflict; and the judgment, contrary to all reasonable expectation, is against you. Here, then, take your stand. You are charged with the peace, the safety, and the interests of the public; it is your duty to protect those interests, and to maintain those privileges which are necessary to enable you to perform your duty to your country. I would say, do nothing rashly: the public will excuse you, if you state your doubts openly and manfully; but you will never command popular favour and approbation by showing weakness or vacillation. You have protested against the jurisdiction of the court, and have warned the judges that you will not allow your privileges to be questioned; and if you hesitate now, you can only be considered as the tenants at will of the Court of Queen's Bench; — for this decision of the court will affect every privilege you possess. The Queen's Bench will concede to you — what? Liberty of speech, and freedom of person. But I say, let them once get the wedge in, and depend upon it they will drive it home. If the House submit to this judgment, what privilege have you which may not be invaded? What privilege, I ask, do you possess, which has not been denied, at one time or other, by the judges? You are publishing reports of your proceedings day by day. I say, stop that publication, if you have any doubt of the necessity or legality of such a course. You are told that you ought to set an example to the courts below; — do so. In the first place, do nothing unlawful; and, in the next place, preserve your authority firmly and gravely, — for no tribunal can long maintain either its honour or usefulness, if it permit its authority to be tampered with. You never can be in so good a condition as now. You have acted with temper and moderation, hitherto; you must now boldly assert your rights, and maintain those privileges which are necessary to enable you effectually to discharge your duties to those whose interests you represent. Here is a case of actual interruption of your authority and usefulness. Here is a man who interferes between you and your officer, and will not permit him to obey your orders, in printing the Reports of your proceedings, and the evidence laid on your table. It makes no difference, in effect, whether the man seizes your officer by the collar, for the purpose of effecting this prevention, or whether he restrains him by any other means, as the effect of the restraint is the same, however it may have been accomplished.

We are told not to go to the inferior jurisdiction, but to go at once to the judges. But what would the courts do in such a case? They would not hesitate to commit the poor sheriff, the poor barrister, or the poor anybody else, if he acted in opposition to them. One court, claiming a jurisdiction, will not suffer it to be usurped by another. The Exchequer will not suffer any interference by any other court in regard to questions relating to the revenue; and the Court of Chancery would at once commit the sheriff for contempt, if he presumed to execute a writ from the Queen's Bench in defiance of their order. I ask you, then, to pursue the same course that is acted upon, in similar cases, by the courts of law. It is the most safe, and, at the same time, it is the proper course; but, if you are to indulge in such tender feelings, that, before you proceed to vindicate your privileges, you are to stop to inquire whether or not the sheriff is culpable, I tell you, you will not have an opportunity of vindicating those privileges at all. But, in this case, your fears are delusive; all you have to do is to show a determination to act. That must lead to a communication; and there can be no doubt that, then, the question would be set to rest in a satisfactory and a constitutional manner.

I have paid much attention to this matter. I have well considered what course would conduce most to the benefit of the House and of the country, and would be least likely to interrupt the progress of the public business; and my advice is, that the privileges of the House be firmly asserted and maintained. There have been numerous cases of interference, both by the House of Commons and House of Lords. I will mention one. A Member was taken in execution for a debt of 4000*l.*, and held in custody by the warden of the Fleet. At that time, a doubt was entertained whether, if a man arrested under execution was once discharged, he could be taken again. The House issued an order to the warden to discharge the Member from custody. The warden refused, and the House committed him for contempt. He still refused to obey the order, and the House then committed him to still closer custody, until, at length, he did discharge the Member of Parliament so arrested, and the House vindicated its privilege. Now, if this was thought a fit course to be taken when only the privilege of one individual Member was involved, why should it not be resorted to in a case in which the privileges of the whole House of Commons are concerned? There can be no doubt of your right to act, now, as the House of Commons did then. But the question is, what is the proper course? Shall we strike out a new course, or pursue the old, which time and precedent have sanctioned? Is not the old the safest course? I would say that, if a considerable majority of the House are of opinion that the privilege of publishing its proceedings is necessary to the proper discharge of the functions of the House, the safest course is, to stop the execution through the sheriff. But if the difference of opinion be great, and if a large portion of the House consider that they ought not to act in the manner I have proposed, then I would say that it is better that the privilege should die a natural death, than that the House should enter on a struggle in which a division of opinion must produce defeat. That which were wise when the House was united, I should consider rashness when the House was divided in opinion. Such, Sir, are my sentiments; and I have now but to thank the House for the indulgence which they have granted me in affording this opportunity of stating my views.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — I can assure the House that I do not rise for the purpose of answering the able speech of my Honourable and Learned Friend who has just sat down. In a great deal of what has fallen from the Honourable and Learned Gentleman I fully concur; and the only question in my mind is one — relative to the special circumstances of the present case. In my opinion, this is not a case of libel, and it ought not to have been treated as a question of libel by the judges, but simply as a communication to the House which was necessary to enable them to frame a measure for the improvement of prisons. In making this declaration, I am emboldened, in some measure, by the opinions which I hold in regard to the publication of the proceedings of this House. It is my impression that the House is not justified in publishing their Reports and proceedings in the manner which is at present acted upon. I think those Reports are published without due examination and care; and I should wish to see, rescinded, the resolution of the House which sanctions the sale of all the papers which are printed by its orders. I also think that the Committee on Printed Papers ought to have the duty intrusted to them of deciding on the propriety of publishing Reports and other accounts of their proceedings. I should wish to give an assurance to the public that the House is disposed to send out no paper likely to prove injurious to individuals, and that due caution is exercised in deciding on the propriety of publishing any Report or other document. One of the learned judges has said that he was desirous to avoid using any language calculated to offend; but that he could not help asking whether any public benefit, resulting from the publication of parliamentary proceedings, could make up for the injury done to individuals, and inflicted on the House itself, by its trading in books? Such, also, was the opinion of the Lord Chief Justice. The reason why I have alluded to this subject is, because the judges seem to have been strongly impressed with the idea that the House had allowed the sale of its proceedings without due care having been exercised to prevent the publication of defamatory matter,—that the House had allowed the publication of Reports without due deliberation and caution. It is my misfortune to differ from my Honourable and Learned Friend in the opinion that this House is, generally, and without qualification, the best and only judge of its own privileges. I think that some limit ought to be defined, and that some line ought to be drawn. None of the known privileges of the House have been denied; but there are cases which might come before the courts of law without any question being raised as to the known and necessary privileges of the House. In the case of "Burdett v. Abbott," Lord Ellenborough, who decided in favour of the Speaker, said, expressly, that cases might arise in which the court must decide against the privilege of Parliament. I will put an extreme case. If the House were to violate any of the rights of the subject, it cannot be doubted that the courts ought to afford protection. I agree in the opinion that this is not a case of libel, and that the House was right in contending for the propriety of the publication of the Report on which the action was founded. I wish that, in the discussion before the court, it had been possible to confine the attention of the court to the point whether or not the House had a right to publish that particular Report? If that point alone had been kept in view, I conceive that it would have been difficult for any court to pronounce for the plaintiff; but, unfortunately, the discussion took a different turn, and the whole subject of privileges in consequence came in question. The plea of my Honourable and Learned Friend the Attorney General was a very proper one, — no one can find fault with it; but there was this difference of opinion about it, — that the judges were entitled to pronounce on the whole plea. The Chief Justice so stated; and Mr. Justice Coleridge said, that they were bound to judge and decide according to their conscience, and according to their opinion of the law.

My Honourable and Learned Friend (Mr. Serjeant Wilde) has made a great point of the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords; but he seems to have forgotten that the case of "Burdett and Abbott" went to the House of Lords, and that that House adjudicated upon it; and yet that case involved some of the dearest privileges of the Commons. Now, I agree with my Honourable and Learned Friend, that in this particular case the House had the right to publish the document, and that the Court of Queen's Bench was wrong in its judgment; and if my Honourable and Learned Friend had addressed the House at the time that Stockdale brought his action, I should have agreed with him that the House would have been fully justified in committing him for a contempt of its privilege: but the point on which I differ from my Honourable and Learned Friend is this, — that special circumstances have since occurred in this case which ought to prevent the House going further with it. My Honourable Friend asks, are we afraid to vindicate our privileges? I contend that we have already done so. We have already rescinded, in effect, our resolution. Now, let the House see what would be the consequences to the sheriff in this case. If he refused to obey the Court of Queen's Bench, it would issue an attachment against him; and if he did issue execution, this House would commit him; and let it also be observed, that in half an hour after his refusal to issue execution, Stockdale might commence an action against him. Would the House, in that case, commit Stockdale? Would they deprive him of the benefit of that action which they have disputed with him? What we should have done was, to have stopped him in the beginning. Instead of that, we have argued the whole matter with him, day by day, and step by step; and now to interfere, and deprive him of the advantage of the judgment pronounced in his favour, and to lay him by the heels just as he is about to reap the fruits of his action, would be to bring the general feeling of the country against the House. This is a course which I am sure the House would not dare to adopt. I say would not dare, because I am sure the House would not dare to do that which it knows to be wrong. Let the House look at the consequence of proceeding against the sheriff in the manner recommended by my Honourable and Learned Friend. That officer would, most undoubtedly, resist the authority of the House, and would obey that of the Court of Queen's Bench. If the House should proceed against the sheriff and commit him, the court, as a matter of course, would vindicate its authority and that of its officer; and should he be, as unquestionably he would be, brought before the court by a habeas corpus, the court would at once discharge him. What course would then be open to the House? Would they call the judges of the court to the bar of this House and commit them? And if they did, would not that be punishing the judges for the conscientious discharge of their duty? For, as has been well remarked by Mr. Justice Coleridge, the judges did not invite the case before them. It was brought under their jurisdiction in the ordinary way, and they could do nothing else than decide it conscientiously. I should be ashamed for the profession to which I belong, if the judges of the land should be called to the bar of this House for such conduct. My Honourable and Learned Friend has talked of the risk of having the privileges of this House brought under the jurisdiction of the House of Lords: but suppose the verdict had been against Stockdale; what was there to prevent his bringing a writ of error, and from taking the case by appeal to the House of Lords?—and there the question of deciding on the privileges of the Commons would have been argued, and probably finally decided. In conclusion, I must again express my opinion that the publication in this case was not a libel, and that the Court of Queen's Bench was wrong in its judgment; but still I must repeat my conviction that the House has let the proper time for asserting its privilege go by,—and on this ground I must give my vote against the amendment.

[Loud cries of "Divide, divide!"]

The SOLICITOR GENERAL. — I shall interfere but for a very few moments; but I cannot shrink from declaring to the House that opinion which I deliberately formed and declared in the committee,—more particularly, as I had the misfortune, on that occasion, to differ from my Honourable and Learned Friend the Attorney General. I at once admit that my reason for not adopting the proposition included in the amendment is, that, under the circumstances of this case, it is absolutely impossible for the House to take the extreme course suggested, without outraging the feelings of every person in the community. I am aware that I differ from a great number of my Honourable Friends on this subject; and, with their permission, I will suggest to them, shortly, the grounds on which I have come to that conclusion. My Right Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for the Tower Hamlets has pointed out the extremely good case the House had for asserting this privilege. If, indeed, we look to the subject-matter of the libel, as it is called, I admit that our case is so strong and so irresistible that we never can hope that a case will again occur, upon which to try the question with such advantage. This must be conceded. But this is not the only question to be considered; for if, by enforcing this order, we should carry with it not only the appearance but the reality of extreme injustice,—then I think the very first step you would take would compensate all the advantage which the case itself could give you. In what would the extreme injustice of such a proceeding consist? If, in the beginning, you had said that the action should not be brought, you then would have imposed an injunction upon the person bringing the action; and he would have known that, if he persisted, his proceeding would be considered as an act of violation of your privileges on his part, which the House would not allow with impunity. The party would know the consequence of his contumacy; and that, if he proceeded with his action, he would be punished. According to my experience of the proceedings of the Court of Chancery, the practice respecting injunctions has been erroneously represented. That court does not restrain the sheriff, but it restrains the counsel, agents, and attorneys of the party,—all of whom are persons who are at liberty to act or not to act. Now, on a ground analogous to this practice of the Court of Chancery, the House of Commons might have said to Stockdale, "You shall not bring this action;" and, if he had then acted in defiance of that injunction, the House might have committed him, his counsel, agent, and attorney. But it is admitted that the House could not commit the judges of the Court of Queen's Bench. They were called upon to give their opinion on the case; they did so,—they could not help doing so. It would be most absurd, therefore, to proceed against them. But, is not the same argument exactly applicable to the case of the sheriff? He takes an oath that he will execute all the Queen's writs that are put into his hands. He would tell you, "I have taken an oath which absolutely binds me to execute this writ." Can you reply, "Never mind that; you shall not do it?" I can only say that, if you had, at first, proceeded against the party, and had, by degrees, got up to this last and ultimate step, it would still have appeared to me to have been a most desperate remedy; but, in the present case, it is proposed that the House should commence with that act of injustice. That is one great objection I have to proceeding further. But there is another objection,—the House, by so acting, would do no good. If they committed the sheriff, he would, perhaps, remain in prison till the end of the Session; but he would then come out, as a matter of course, and execution on the judgment would be levied. What, then, would the House do during the next Session? They could not commit the sheriff, for he would be out of office, and another would have been appointed, against whom no proceedings could be taken, as he would not have had anything to do with the matter. You would, therefore, find yourselves, at last, just in the same predicament as you are in now. I therefore have come to the conclusion, that whatever course it may be thought right to pursue in future cases, the House cannot persist in proceeding further in the present case. I cannot conclude without expressing my high approbation of the speech we have heard from my Honourable and Learned Friend (Mr. Serjeant Wilde), — a speech which, whether for depth of research, or clearness of arrangement, or aptness of illustration, has, certainly, very seldon been equalled, and never can be surpassed.

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

Mr. WYNN. — Sir, I wish to occupy the attention of the House for a few moments, although I feel that I can add little to the masterly speech of the Honourable and Learned Member for Newark, which appears to have exhausted the subject. I consider that the House is now placed in that situation in which it must either be prepared to take some decided step to vindicate its privileges, or abandon them altogether; therefore, however much I may regret to see the House placed in such a position, I feel that, although called upon at the eleventh, or, I may say, the twelfth hour, I have no choice left to me but to support the motion of the Honourable Member for Bridport, for resisting the execution of the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench. That judgment strikes at the foundation of all our privileges — the very basis on which they rest.

Cries of "Divide!" and, "Question!"]

The argument on which the judgment of the Lord Chief Justice and the other learned judges was founded, appears to me to call in question the ancient and long-established right of this House to determine upon matters of its own privileges. I will not attempt to cope with those high authorities on legal points; but I do contend that, with respect to the particular privilege now called in question, the right of printing and publishing and even selling copies of our proceedings is supported by a continuous exercise, more uninterrupted than any other, — extending over a period of 160 years, — for, with one very short interruption only, it has been exercised daily, and without question, ever since the year 1680. Without going into those numerous authorities which have been so ably cited by the Honourable and Learned Member for Newark, I must affirm that all the weight of authority is in favour of this privilege. The Lord Chief Justice, in quoting the opinion of Judge Blackstone, seemed to throw overboard the opinion of that eminent judge, as a commentator. Justice Blackstone, in that admirable work of his, with which all are acquainted, quoting the opinion of Coke, says, —

> Whatever is enacted for law by one or two of the three separate branches of the Legislature has not the force of a statute, and is entitled to no regard, unless in matters relating to their own privileges.;

This was an exception made by Lord Coke; but was that all? He afterwards adds, —

> The whole law and custom of Parliament has its origin in this one circumstance, — that whatever matter arises respecting either House of Parliament ought to be examined, discussed, and adjudged in the House to which it relates, and not elsewhere.

These words are quoted from Lord Coke, and to them Blackstone adds the weight of his own authority. It has been said, to-night, that the committee might have expressed themselves in language less liable to be misunderstood; but let me ask, can the English language afford terms in which the rights and privileges of this House can be more strongly or more plainly stated, or language which is less open to misapprehension, than are here employed. There is another authority which goes even farther than these, — that of Mr. Justice Gould. He says, —

> Matters of privilege might come incidentally before the Court of Queen's Bench, and then it would be obliged to determine on them; but even then only because the House, itself, had decided that its privileges did not protect libels.

In that case, too, it was the case of an individual Member, not of the privileges of the House. The House had determined that its privilege did not protect seditious libels; they communicated with the House of Lords; and, having come to a resolution, communicated the result to the Court of Common Pleas. I know of no stronger proof of the right of the House of Commons to decide on its own privileges. I will not delay the House by quoting, at length, the opinion of the Chief Justice, as delivered on that occasion; but the substance of it was, that he felt a doubt whether the court could interfere against a commitment by the House. At this day, at the commencement of the Session, the Speaker claims for the Members of this House, protection for themselves, their servants, and their lands during the sitting of Parliament. The privilege of protection against suits is no longer claimed — because it has been found to be unnecessary for the public advantage; and so with regard to all other privileges,—they are not continued for the mere personal gratification of the Members of this House, but the moment they are found to be no longer conducive to the public benefit they are abandoned. It is now exactly twenty-nine years since, in the case of Burdett v. Abbott, I remonstrated against the course then pursued, of directing the then Attorney General to plead to the action. I then thought that the House, having pleaded in bar, should have adopted its ancient weapon of commitment, and committed all the parties. But having pleaded in bar, it was not then too late; and accordingly I moved a resolution declaring that all parties concerned in carrying on the action would be guilty of a great breach of the privileges of the House. That motion did not meet with the support of the majority. It was opposed by Mr. Perceval and Mr. Charles Yorke, who were at that time Ministers of the Crown, and a large majority; but I have always the satisfaction of reflecting that that motion was supported by Sir Arthur Pigott, Mr. Adams, Lord Althorp, and the highest constitutional authorities of the day. It is argued, that in the present case we have allowed the proper time to go by, — that the opportunity for vindicating our privileges has passed, — but that if the offence be repeated, then the House will act at once. Now, in what a situation shall we thus be in? Will not our privilege be in some degree compromised; — and then can we say that the next case may not be identically the same as this, while our own position will probably be much worse? Now, suppose you take time to consider as to the propriety of passing a declaratory Act — which, I suppose, will bring us on towards the close of the Session. The committee may report, perhaps, one or two days before the Session ends. Another action is commenced on any libel that can be found in any of our printed Reports, either of this year, last year, or even the year before. We know that the Court of Queen's Bench will admit it, and will take cognizance of it, and that it may be carried on to judgment before the meeting of the House — supposing that the meeting takes place next Session at the usual period, February; we should then find ourselves in a similar situation to that we are in now — except that the damages might be found to a much greater amount. I say, then, the safe course is that which the House has in previous cases adopted, — namely, to commit the parties.

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

I am as jealous as any man of bringing the privileges of this House before the House of Lords by a writ of error; because it would be bringing them before the Lords to be decided on by them in their judicial capacity. But if you pass a declaratory law, and go to the Lords for their assent to the same, you will be calling on them, as co-ordinate legislators interested in preserving the privileges of this House. I do not think that a declaratory Act would weaken our privileges; we should still be able to support and enforce them by all the means in our power. When this question was argued before, I told the House that they must make up their minds either to protect their privileges, or not; and that if they did not mean to protect their privileges to the utmost of their power, they had better give them up at once, or they would be driven into a corner at last, and be compelled to adopt a severe and extreme remedy.

[Cries of "Question!" and, "Divide!"]

This House must have the supreme power for deciding upon its own privileges; — but if they are to be under the control of the Court of Queen's Bench, or other inferior courts, then the House of Commons becomes inferior to the courts of law.

[Renewed cries of "Divide, divide!"]

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK.—Having had the honour of being in the chair in the committee to which this same subject was referred two years ago, I cannot suffer this debate to close without saying a very few words as to what are the grounds on which my vote of this evening will be given. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman the Member for Newark has argued so admirably, and, in my opinion, so unanswerably, on the general question, that upon that I need not add one single word. I think the Honourable and Learned Member has demonstrated, beyond the power of refutation, and almost beyond the power of all answer, that this House possesses that particular privilege for which we contend, of publishing our papers without being liable to question in a court of law,—and also the still higher and more important principle, that this House is the last and only judge of its own privileges. I think the Honourable and Learned Gentleman has demonstrated both these points; and I believe that a very large majority of this House concur in that opinion. The only question, then, on which I wish to say a single word, is, as to what, under present circumstances, is the course which ought to be adopted with a view of maintaining those ancient and valuable privileges, which the Honourable and Learned Gentleman has shown that we possess?

On this point, I confess that I heard with great astonishment, indeed, the speech of the Right Honourable Member for Ripon (Sir Edward Sugden). He says that "the case is no libel which has been brought before the Court of Queen's Bench;" and yet the course which he recommends to us is, to rescind the resolution of 1835, authorising the sale of our papers. In what way would such a step contribute to relieve us from the difficulty? In the courts of justice, all parties are agreed that the question of law is in no way affected by the sale. What effect, then, would the rescinding of that resolution have, except to encourage further encroachments? If anything would tend to confirm me in the opinion I entertain, it would be the reason which the Right Honourable Gentleman has assigned for recommending this course;—"Do this," he says, "because, however little reason there may be for objecting to the sale of these papers, still the feeling is against it,"—Mr. Justice Coleridge having observed upon what he terms the "unconstitutional" practice of the House in raising money by the sale of its papers; and another Learned and Noble Judge having said that the House were reducing themselves to the position of "traders in books." I must, however, beg to say, that, in the language they have so used, the judges have only shown their utter and entire ignorance of the subject.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!" and, "Hear!"]

The House of Commons is no "trader in books;" the House of Commons does not "raise money illegally or unconstitutionally," by selling the papers which it prints. And Lord Denman, in using this language, so calculated to create an impression against the House of Commons, stated that he had read the former Reports of the Committee on Printed Papers, in which it was stated that the papers were sold at far less than they cost. And, whether to profit or not, this House, as a branch of the Legislature, has no concern in the matter; the whole is managed in the only manner in which it could be managed,—by the executive authorities acting under the Crown. It is the Lords of the Treasury who conduct this business;—Mr. Hansard accounting to them for the sale of the papers,—and the produce goes towards defraying his charge for printing. The House of Commons no more raises money by the sale of those papers than it raises money by the sale of Ordnance stores, which takes place precisely in the same manner,—the produce of the sales being appropriated in diminution of the Ordnance expenses. And because two judges have shown, what, I must say, in their situations, is most blameable ignorance on such a subject, we are to rescind the resolution of the House, and to reverse a rule to which, on many accounts, it is most important that the House should adhere! The Right Honourable Gentleman (Sir Edward Sugden) then says we ought to be more cautious in publishing our papers. Has any one shown, yet, that a proper want of caution exists? Was there any want of caution in this particular case? The only complainant is this Mr. Stockdale; and I appeal to the Honourable and Learned Member for Newark, to say with what justice he has come forward. So far as I have seen anything of the House of Commons, there has always been a great and laudable anxiety, here, to avoid, as far as possible, wounding the feelings of private individuals. I appeal to the Honourable Gentleman who was chairman of the Committee on Transportation, if we did not often leave out particulars and names, which were yet necessary in order to give the country the means of scrutinising the truth of statements in the Reports,—in our anxiety to save individual feeling; and whether we did not almost err on the side of respect to private feeling than otherwise? I have witnessed the same thing in many other instances. I will not allude to cases of petitions containing objectionable passages, which may have been presented and printed in pursuance of motions made to that effect by individual Members, without a sufficient degree of caution being exercised in examining their contents; but I will say, that of late years, and since the time when the rule was established that these papers should be sold under certain regulations, the House has been far more cautious in printing petitions than before. And the Right Honourable Gentleman must remember that the printing of petitions by which calumnies may be disseminated, and the selling of those petitions, does not date from a period prior to the year 1815; while, on the contrary, the regular sale of votes has never ceased for considerably more than a century and a half. When, therefore, the Court of Queen's Bench tell us that the votes contain no criminatory matter, that is another example to show with how little of that information and caution which ought to be observed in a case of this kind, the judges have taken on themselves to pronounce on this case. The votes have often contained facts conveying the severest censure on individuals. Why, Sir, the other day only, did you not pronounce a very severe, though just and well deserved, censure on an individual who had been found guilty of committing a fraud on this House? and might not that party, Benjamin Lovibond, bring an action against the printer for publishing that censure? One of your very first acts, Sir, on taking that chair, was, to call that individual to the bar and reprimand him for the fraud he had so committed. It was necessary that the public should be made acquainted with the circumstances, in order to deter others from similar conduct; and yet, for publishing that reprimand, our officer is liable to an action for libel! But I will return to the point on which alone I wish to address the House with respect to the course we are to adopt. If we are not to rescind our order for selling papers, if we are to maintain our privileges, the question is, are we to take the course recommended by the Honourable Member for Bridport? or are we to allow Mr. Stockdale to receive the 100*l.* awarded to him? I am far from denying that there is great weight in the argument of the Honourable Baronet (Sir E. Sugden) on the effect of our past proceedings on public opinion; and I think the answer of my Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Newark may be correct; but at the same time, in having allowed Mr. Stockdale to proceed as he has proceeded, without having hitherto taken any final steps, we have to a certain extent in public estimation committed the House, and I have no doubt that what the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman (Sir E. Sugden) has said about the plea being put in is correct; but I cannot help thinking, that when the plea was put in, the Attorney General should not have been directed to support it by arguments, but that it should have been left to the court deal with it as it might think proper, and that this House ought to have committed Mr. Stockdale, his attorney, and counsel.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and laughter.]

That would have been the proper course. Having committed, however, an error, — being, to a certain degree, in a disadvantageous position already,—it is now to be considered how we shall make that position more or less disadvantageous, by persevering in the course we have adopted. I confess this is a point on which I have had great difficulty in making up my mind. I was for a long time disposed to believe, with the Right Honourable Baronet, that it was better to persevere with regard to this case; and it was only on the most mature deliberation that I was disposed to adopt the conclusion, that it were safer to concede no farther, — that we must ultimately make a stand, and that it were better to do so, now, than to run the risk of incurring still greater difficulty; and I confess that I am greatly confirmed in this view by the manner in which the question has been argued by those who are in favour of the concession being made. I find that the great majority of the Gentlemen who advocate that course are those who, like the Honourable Member for Ripon, conceive that this House has no real means of protecting its own privileges.

SIR E. SUGDEN. — That is not my opinion.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — I am glad to hear that that is not the opinion of the Right Honourable and Learned Gentleman. But still it does appear to me that there is a strong leaning in his mind, that, in a conflict with the courts of law, when it comes to the last extremity, the House of Commons must yield. My Honourable and Learned Friend the Solicitor General has argued under that impression. When a person argues under an impression of ultimate defeat, I must confess that I am not over anxious to follow his advice; I would rather act under the advice of those who trust and hope, from their conscience, that they shall ultimately succeed. I think that we have a sufficient warning in the concessions that we have already made. When, influenced by the opinions of my Honourable Friends near me, I concurred in the resolution that the Attorney General should be directed to plead, and appear in this case, I certainly was not prepared to expect that the concession then made was to afford such arms against us hereafter; and the speech of the Honourable Baronet the Member for Oxford University, and the speech of the Right Honourable and Learned Member for Ripon, this evening, show me very clearly, that if we make another step in the road of concession, it will be extremely difficult for us again to stop. I am not one of those who believe that our taking this course would make the future assertion of our privileges hopeless; I trust that that will not be the case, because I anticipate that the decision of the House will be very contrary to what I desire. I should be sorry indeed, if that decision should irrevocably debar the House from the future assertion of its privileges. I have now stated — very imperfectly, I am aware—the chief grounds which induce me to come to the conclusion, that we ought now to take measures for preventing the execution of the judgment. Having avowed that opinion in the committee, I thought I was bound to avow it here; and I certainly shall give my vote in favour of the amendment of the Honourable Member for Bridport.

[Loud cries of "Question, question!"]

Mr. FITZROY KELLY. — Sir, I should not have trespassed on the attention of the House, but for some of the observations which have fallen from the Noble Lord who has just spoken.

[Loud cries of "Oh, oh!" and, "Divide!"]

If the House will not afford me a hearing for a few moments, I shall be reduced to the painful necessity of moving an adjournment.

[Renewed cries of "Oh, oh!" "Hear, hear!" and, "Divide!"]

The judges, everywhere but here, are treated with the respect due to them. The Noble Lord has thought fit (I hope I may not say deliberately) to charge the learned judges, who are not here to answer for themselves, with having pronounced a judgment in ignorance of the facts, and without due consideration.

[Loud cries of "Hear!" "Oh!" and, "Divide!"]

I venture to tell the Noble Lord ——

[Loud cries of "Oh!"]

— that he may esteem himself happy if his speeches, in or out of the House, are distinguished by the sound constitutional learning which is to be found in any one of the judges to whom the Noble Lord has alluded.

[Great noise, and cries of "Oh!"]

With regard to the resolution of the Noble Lord, it does appear to me that this House is brought by it into a condition in which it cannot recede with dignity, advance with consistency, or stand still with safety.

[Cries of "Hear!" "Divide!" and laughter.]

The House then divided upon the question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the question:" — Ayes 184; Noes 166; — Majority 18.

Main question put, and agreed to, "1. Resolved, that it is the opinion of this House, that, under the special circumstances of the case of Stockdale v. Hansard, it is not expedient to adopt any proceedings for the purpose of staying the execution of the judgment."

Motion made, and question put, "That this House, considering the power of publishing such of its Reports, votes, and proceedings, as it shall deem necessary or conducive to the public interests, an essential incident to its constitutional functions, will enter into the consideration of such measures as it may be advisable to take, in consequence of the recent judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench, for the maintenance and protection of that power, so soon as the committee shall have made that full and complete report on this important matter, which they have declared it to be their intention to make in the commencement of their Second Report."

SIR R. H. INGLIS. — At this late hour, and particularly as this resolution has been fully discussed with the former, I shall not detain the House with any observations upon it. I will state my objection to it in one sentence, — namely, that this resolution postpones, perhaps till the year 1842, any ulterior proceedings with reference to this subject. On these grounds I shall meet it with a negative.

Mr. HUME. — I shall be glad if any member of the committee can inform me when it is probable that any ulterior measure will be brought forward; because, whilst the present state of things continues, it is obvious that it will be necessary to put an end to all printing on the part of this House. If the House is not able to defend its own servants in the publication and distribution of its own printed papers, it will at least be well, that no further legal expense should be incurred, and that the House should bend its neck at once to the yoke imposed upon it. I regard this as the commencement of a course of humiliation, at once disgraceful and degrading to the House of Commons. I hope, therefore, that some member of the committee will favour the House with an opinion — or, at least, a guess — as to when it is probable that ulterior measures will be introduced?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL.—Of course, I cannot give a positive answer, on the part of the committee, to the Honourable Gentleman's question; but I see no reason why there should be any long delay in the preparation and introduction of a measure in conformity with what appears to be the general view of the House. At the same time, it will be competent for any Honourable Member to give notice, to-morrow, for leave to bring in a Bill upon the subject, without waiting for the Report of the committee. I am sorry that the Honourable Member for Kilkenny feels himself so much humiliated; but I do not see how the Honourable Member's humiliation can be increased by assenting to the course now proposed and approved of by the majority of the House.

Mr. HUME. — I beg to say that I have no share in the humiliation which must be felt, or at least ought to be felt, by the majority of the House. I have before observed, that this proceeding is likely to drag the House into the mud. The House may now be said to be struggling in the very depths of the quagmire.

The House divided: — Ayes 133; Noes 36; — Majority for the resolution 97.

SHANNON NAVIGATION BILL.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER.—In moving for leave to bring in a Bill for the improvement of the navigation of the Shannon, I will merely state that the Bill is founded on the Report of commissioners appointed by the House, and under the special provisions of an Act of Parliament directing the mode of proceeding. I have now fulfilled my pledge, that the House should not be called on to legislate on this subject until the whole amount of the expense to be incurred should be known, especially as to the matter of compensation to be awarded to private parties. The amount claimed under this head was about half a million; but it has been reduced, now, to something like 14,000*l*. If we had gone on in the ordinary way, — that is, of referring the several cases to juries to decide, the cost would undoubtedly have been much greater, although, perhaps, still considerably below the amount claimed. My object in now introducing the Bill is, that Honourable Members may have an opportunity of considering its provisions before the second reading. I now beg to move for leave to bring in a Bill for the improvement of the river Shannon.

Upon the question being put,—

Mr. HUME said: — I think that an important Bill like this should not have been deferred till this late period of the Session. I understand that the prorogation is to take place on the 15th of next month; and it is quite impossible that this Bill can pass before that time.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I trust I shall be enabled to pass it through before the end of the Session, for I cannot anticipate that any opposition will be offered.

The motion was then agreed to. Bill ordered to be brought in by the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH. Bill subsequently presented, and read a first time; to be read a second time on Friday, and to be printed.

PUBLIC WORKS (IRELAND).

On the motion of the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER, Acts relating thereto read, and Bill to amend the same ordered to be brought in by Mr. CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and LORD VISCOUNT MORPETH.

IMPRISONMENT FOR DEBT.

The EARL of WICKLOW. — I am anxious to put a question to the Noble and Learned Lord on the woolsack. The Noble and Learned Lord will recollect that, in the discussion on the Bill — the Imprisonment for Debt Bill — which was passed last Session of Parliament, I expressed a wish that its provisions, or provisions of a similar character, should be extended to Ireland. I was, however, told that, in consequence of the difference between the existing law in the two countries, that Bill could only be applicable to England. But I understood the Noble and Learned Lord, at the same time, to throw out a promise, that if he saw th principle of the new law operate beneficially, here (saying nothing of the details), he would let the subject stand over, with a view to the introduction of a Bill of the same nature for Ireland. I do not know anything of the working of the measure in this country. I cannot say whether it is or is not an improvement of the law. I, however, presume that it is an improvement. But I think that the principle of the Bill ought to be adopted with reference to Ireland — and that the law should be assimilated as much as possible in the two countries. I therefore beg to ask, whether the Noble and Learned Lord means to introduce a measure of this nature for Ireland?

The LORD CHANCELLOR. — The delay has arisen in consequence of the difficulty of arranging the details, as the law varies considerably in the two countries. The law authorities are, however, favourable to such a Bill. Your Lordships, however, must be aware that no measure of this kind can be perfected in the present Session.

BEER ACT.

On the motion of LORD ELLENBOROUGH, ordered — Copies of the answers received by the commissioners appointed to inquire as to the best means of establishing an efficient constabulary force, to the following query, circulated by them to magistrates in petty sessions and the guardians of unions: — "Are the beer-shops or public houses within your division the subject of complaint? and are they, in point of fact, ill conducted?"

And on the motion of LORD ELLENBOROUGH, the clerk assistant was ordered to prepare — "a Return showing the number of petitions against the Beer Act presented to the House in this Session and in the years 1837 and 1838, from magistrates in quarter sessions, magistrates in petty sessions, boards of guardians, inhabitants of parishes and towns, and bodies of individuals, respectively."

BEER ACT IN PART REPEAL BILL.

LORD BROUGHAM. — My Lords, with respect to the measure which was under discussion last night, an objection has been raised that it contains certain fiscal regulations, and therefore cannot be brought forward in your Lordships' House, and will necessarily be objected to in the other House of Parliament. Now, I have considered the subject thoroughly, and there is no doubt on my mind that, with the strictest attention to the privileges of the other House, it is perfectly competent for the House of Lords to pass such a measure.

THE MILLION LOAN (IRELAND.)

VISCOUNT DUNCANNON. — The Noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Westmeath), last night, put a question to me, respecting an advance of 100,000*l.* by the ecclesiastical commissioners to the Board of Works in Ireland, out of the Million Loan Fund. In explanation, I beg to inform the Noble Marquess that, on application being made, the 100,000*l.* will be paid to the commissioners, with interest. As to the amount to be advanced to the clergy being at the rate of 75 per cent., I am not aware that any official statement has been made, that authorises the assumption of such being the amount.

The EARL of WICKLOW. — This money was, in the first instance, advanced for the relief of the Irish clergy; and if the sum thus lent to the Board of Works be not applied to the purpose for which it was originally intended, it will be a direct robbery of the clergy to the amount of 100,000*l.*

LORD ELLENBOROUGH. — Nearly five years have elapsed since the Church Temporalities Bill was passed, and the working of that Act has been exactly what I predicted it would be, at the time: that part of the measure to which this advance relates is an entire failure.

COMMERCIAL (LONDON AND BLACKWALL) RAILWAY BILL.

Report further considered (prints having been delivered upon Friday, the 14th of June); motion made, and question proposed, "That the amendments made by the committee to the Bill be now read a second time."

Mr. CRAWFORD. — I rise to oppose the further progress of this Bill, which, it will be in the recollection of Honourable Members, was likewise opposed on the second reading. Upon that occasion, it was opposed upon the ground that the promoters of it had been guilty of a breach of that faith upon which the Bill of 1836 was granted. By that Bill it was agreed that the railroad should terminate without entering the eastern boundary of the city of London. The first clause declared that the company should not lay down any rails within 600 feet of the boundary of the city; and the second, that they should not possess any land within the city of London. It was since decided, by a small majority of the House, that the Bill should be sent to a committee, with a view to give the parties concerned an opportunity of showing that they could make out a case for the rescinding of the agreement; and it is now my duty to show how far they have succeeded in making out such a case. In conformity with certain conditions stipulated in the Standing Orders of the House, in 1836, the parties state, in their declaration, that they have a sufficiency of funds for the proposed extension of the railway; but they say that those funds arise from two sources; one of which is, that the original plan of making the railway has been altered. The estimate, under that plan, was 600,000*l.*; they say that, under the altered plan, the whole expense will be defrayed by 465,000*l.*, leaving a surplus of 135,000*l.* applicable to the proposed extension line. Now, in the course of the inquiry before the committee, it was proved that as to the sum of 465,000*l.* a great number of expenses have been omitted; the amount of which must, of course, be deducted out of the 135,000*l.* Another part of the declaration is, that the company have the power of borrowing 200,000*l.*, — being the second source from which those funds are to be derived; whereas no such authority exists. These are facts which the committee should have specially reported; but they declined to do so, because it was urged by the parties to the Bill that the case having been before the Committee on Standing Orders, and having been considered by them, the committee on the Bill had nothing to do with it.

Before I can explain to the House the particulars of the extension sought for by the promoters of the Bill, it will be necessary for me to show what were the powers granted to the company by the Bill of 1836, and in what manner they have been departed from. Under that Bill there was to be a continuous line of arches forming a viaduct, over which the line was to run. It was to be of the width of 46 feet, and there were to be four lines of railroad. Since then the directors have taken it upon themselves to make these alterations; —they have reduced the width from 46 feet to 26 feet; there are now to be only two lines of railway, and it is proposed that these two lines are to be worked by means of a stationary engine, — a new attempt, which has never yet been made on any railroad in this country, and the practicability of which is unsupported, except by the testimony of one person. The gradients are entirely altered; and the promoters of the Bill say they will use neither locomotive power nor stationary power for carrying the communication into the city. They desire to go 415 yards into the city; but they say they will effect this by the power of momentum; that is, that the carriages shall, from travelling at the rate of twenty-seven miles an hour, receive such an impetus as will make them find their way, by a considerable ascent, to Fenchurch Street, where they are to stop, — an attempt which will be attended with danger, and is very likely to fail altogether. In returning, the carriages are to descend by the force of their own gravity. The distance of the proposed extension is 415 yards, and the rough estimate of the expense is 153,000*l.*, — that being at the rate of 370*l.* per yard. This, I think, is conclusive as to the value of the property to be destroyed: besides, there is a great amount of property scheduled, but not provided for by the company, valued at 361,000*l.*, which they claim a right to take, unprovided for as it is. In 1836, there were two contending parties, who had each a subscription list for 600,000*l.* — 12,000 shares at 50*l.*; with the consent of the committee these two parties joined, and made a list of 24,000 shares, at 25*l.*, — a smaller sum than has before been fixed for railway shares. The committee, however, imposed this restriction, — that all the subscriptions should be paid up before borrowing should be resorted to; and the effect of the "pocket" clause, which is now attempted to be brought in, will be to allow the company to borrow 200,000*l.* without that restriction, — a permission not given before. It was only by chance that this clause was discovered. At the half-yearly meeting which took place on the 30th of August last, a report was made by the directors to the proprietors, in which they stated that they were not allowed to borrow money until the whole of their subscribed capital was paid up; that that was an unusual restriction, and that they proposed to apply to Parliament to be relieved from it: and it further stated that, if they were so relieved, it would then be for the consideration of the proprietors whether there should be any further call, or not. Will the House sanction the borrowing of money under such circumstances? There is but one other observation which I shall make, and that is in reference to the position in which the railroad company now stands with the East and West India Dock Companies, as regards the use of the Brunswick Wharf. Up to this time the railway company have had no power of access to the wharfs on the River Thames. No authority has been given to the railroad company to embark or disembark passengers at the Brunswick Wharf; and yet such authority is now claimed. The promoters of the Bill have been asked, over and over again, to produce the agreement between the railway company and the East and West India Dock Companies; their counsel have consented to its production, but the promoters of the Bill have not thought proper to produce it. Under all these circumstances, I move, That the Report be taken into further consideration upon this day six months.

LORD TEIGNMOUTH. — Sir, I trust the House will bear with patience the few observations I have to make. I must say that I have heard the statements made by the Honourable Member with utter astonishment. In my opinion, ample reason has been given for allowing this Bill to pass. I sat for twenty-one days, four hours each day, on the committee on this Bill, in which neither myself nor my constituents have the slightest interest, and I was perfectly convinced that this railroad would prove a vast benefit to the community; such was my impartial opinion after having heard all the evidence. I shall therefore give it my most hearty concurrence. I hold in my hand a paper containing the whole of the figures taken before the committee, and they show clearly that there will be a surplus of 106,000*l.* in the hands of the company, — and that upon a very fair estimate. The Honourable Gentleman complains of some technicalities respecting the Standing Orders; but the committee on the Bill had nothing at all to do with the Standing Orders. He has quarrelled with the engineering accounts; but the committee had had before them some of the most eminent engineers in the country, and their estimates were given in such a clear and distinct manner as to prove perfectly satisfactory to the committee; while the only testimony my Honourable Friend has to rely upon, in opposition to it, is that of a Swedish engineer, who acknowledged that he knew nothing about railroads. The benefit to be derived from this railroad will be very great. With regard to the destruction of property, that will certainly take place to some extent; but that is a result common to all railroads. Nothing can prove the goodness of the plan more than the fact, that the expenditure has been below the estimate. If the terminus were to be at the Minories, the neighbouring streets must be crowded by the immense traffic which would be distributed in the neighbourhood; whereas the proposed terminus brings it up at once upon the spot at which it is to be distributed. The Honourable Gentleman complains of the annoyance to which the inhabitants will be exposed; but it has been clearly proved that there will be no excessive noise from the passing of the train. I shall give my cordial support to the Bill.

Mr. D. W. HARVEY. — Sir, having presented a petition signed by upwards of 400 inhabitants, owners, and occupiers of property in the immediate vicinity of the proposed line of railway, (which petition was ordered to be printed at the expense of the parties,) it becomes my duty to state the contents of their petition, and I feel great satisfaction in saying that the course I am pursuing is precisely that which I proposed on a former occasion; and it is essential I should say this, because the promoters of the Bill have incurred the serious expense of inserting in all the morning papers a long extract from some remarks which I made upon the first introduction of the Railway Bill. I was then the advocate of the railroad, because I felt the importance of clearing the Pool of the inconvenience occasioned, at present, by its being so crowded; and the company then got all they wanted — a line from Blackwall to the Minories; but now they are asking to bring it into the heart of the city of London. They obtained a Bill to clear the Pool of all these inconveniences; and yet now, in 1839, they have scarcely done anything towards its accomplishment. Why this delay? Because they had not, till now, matured the plan of combination, then flitting before their eyes, of bringing two important bodies into co-operation; but they have now secured the direct co-operation of the East and West India Dock Companies, — the latter of which companies has purchased the East India Company's warehouses in Fenchurch Street. The object of the Bill is, at this time, to establish a monopoly of conveyance from the Blackwall Docks to Fenchurch Street. The petitioners call upon the House to preserve their property from wanton violation. The original Report of the committee was, that a terminus on the eastern side of the Minories would be a complete terminus for their purpose. Was there any evidence given before the committee, to show that persons who were expected to use the railroad, would use it less, because it went no further than the Minories? Quite the reverse. Only one engineer was examined, and he stated that he believed the railroad, at first projected, would run 10,000 daily, though he expected it would have an increased traffic if it proceeded to Fenchurch Street. Is the trifling increase of traffic on the line, thus contemplated, a fair compensation for the vast destruction of property required by the proposed extension of the line? — 415 yards are proposed to be purchased at a sum of 200,000*l.*; in fact, a rate of price something less than a million of money is to be given for a mile of railroad. Who are to have the use of it? Not the public, — it is to be confined entirely to the proprietors of the East and West India Docks. The consequence will be, that, instead of there being a railroad in a large and comprehensive sense, this will be an excellent contrivance to bring two pieces of private property together. The effect of it will be in every way highly injurious to the public. I do not hesitate to say, after a close and personal inspection of the locality of Blackwall, that instead of taking people from the Minories, or from Fenchurch Street, to the water-side, it will only take them down to the East India Dock property, — for the use of which property they will have to pay as a property distinct and unconnected with the railroad. Gentlemen who read the Reports will find it was not till after the committee had drawn up their Report that it was found there was a secret article of agreement between the shareholders of the railroad and the directors of the docks. I am sure the Noble Lord opposite (Lord Teignmouth) will concur with me in that statement. The terms of that secret compact are, that the company shall be a railroad company only as carriers, and that the proprietors of the docks shall be wharfingers; that as wharfingers they shall impose a charge on the public; that the railroad proprietors shall impose another charge on the public, — and thus two impositions are to be inflicted. Whereas, if the original purpose of the Bill had been carried out, the railroad would not have gone on to the East India Docks at all, but would have stopped short at Blackwall Stairs. The Blackwall Stairs are public property, from which all parties could embark. The company has chosen not to hold out any benefit to the public, but has allied itself with the East India Dock Company, to the great prejudice of the public. It is a great mistake to say that this is a railroad from London to Blackwall; it is a line of communication from London to all the trading ports in the world; and yet the reception of goods is to be confined to this dock company. Such being the case, it is clear that a most dangerous monopoly will be established. Well, then, let us see what will be the effect in town. Is the House prepared to sanction a measure which will pour thousands at a time into a small space? If, upon an average, 10,000 persons are brought into London in a day, it is not improbable that on some days there might be an influx of 40,000 or 50,000; and no man can calculate the extent of the inconvenience and danger that would be the consequence. What says Mr. Harvey? He says, that at the Birmingham terminus in Euston Square there is accommodation, to the extent of seven acres, for 1700 passengers daily, while at the Blackwall terminus there will not be, for 10,000 persons, more than 120 to 180 feet! Mr. Harvey was asked what space he thought would be necessary for so large an influx of persons? and his answer was, "Not less than seven acres." When his attention was called to the space of 120 feet, he said, "such limited accommodation would be fraught with mischief to the public." An eminent surveyor, who looked at the property, declared that the property would, in the immediate neighbourhood, be deteriorated to an extent of from 40 to 60 per cent. The customers of the butchers, bakers, and grocers would be removed; and where is their compensation to come from? They can have none; and that is a reason why this House should protect them. I am aware that I am addressing landlords; and I have heard of one extraordinary instance of a landlord receiving as much as 120,000*l.* for 30 acres of land, and of the stopping of a Bill until that sum was paid to him. I hope, however, that the House will not be indifferent to the prayer of the petition which I have presented; but that it will be more zealous to protect their interests, because they have to contend against a powerful company of great wealth and influence.

Mr. CLAY. — Sir, it is not my intention to occupy the House many minutes; but, as the representative of the Tower Hamlets, I feel bound to make an observation or two. I wish to discharge my duty properly, but I fear that, in whatever way I vote, my vote will be the subject of misconstruction. The Legislature had sanctioned the railroad from Blackwall to the Minories, and as soon as that sanction was given, the greater part of the objections of my constituents were overruled, because 19-20ths of the disturbance of the private property complained of had been already allowed to take place. The principal injury was to tradespeople, and that has been sanctioned. Bringing the railway into Fenchurch Street may destroy some houses occupied by merchants as counting-houses; but that will be only a temporary inconvenience. As to the objection of the Honourable Member who has just sat down, that there is no access to the water from Blackwall,— surely it is not to be said that, because Parliament allow persons to form a railway, therefore it ought to make them watermen. Besides, the company has the means of making a most convenient entrance to the water. Upon the whole, I feel bound to vote in favour of the measure.

Mr. PRYME. — Sir, I perfectly agree with the Honourable Member, that this is a Public Bill in point of fact, though a Private Bill by name; and that, so far from its being calculated to uphold any monopoly, its nature is quite the reverse. I do not speak merely from the evidence that I have read on the subject, but from ocular demonstration, as I took two journeys down to Blackwall this year. The great object of the Bill is, to facilitate conveyance from the East India Docks into the city of London, and I am of opinion it will be most useful in that respect. I speak from no interested motive — I have no connection with any party or power connected with the undertaking. My mind is completely a piece of blank paper, as far as this matter is concerned. Until I come to the consideration of the question before the House, therefore, I shall vote without any bias on one side or the other.

The House divided: — Ayes 176; Noes 73; — Majority 103.

Main question put, and agreed to; amendments read a second time, and agreed to; Bill to be ingrossed.

THE BUDGET.

Mr. HUME. — May I ask the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer when he intends to bring forward a statement of the finances of the country?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — On Friday, 5th of July, I shall move certain resolutions with a view to the introduction of a uniform rate of postage, and I shall take that opportunity of bringing forward my financial statement.

JOINT STOCK BANKS.

Mr. HUME. — Sir, I wish to know when the Right Honourable Gentleman intends to bring forward any measure for the regulation of joint stock banks?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — If the Honourable Gentleman had not been out of town, he would have been aware that I have already stated my intentions with regard to that subject. It is my intention, during the present week, to bring in a Bill renewing the measure of last year. I also mean to introduce a measure with reference to the Bank of Ireland, which will, to some extent, alter the position of the joint stock banks in that county.

DANISH CLAIMS.

Mr. CRESSWELL. — Sir, I rise to move, pursuant to my notice, "That an humble Address be presented to her Majesty, praying that she will be graciously pleased to direct the commissioners to whom it was referred to examine the claims of certain British subjects in respect of losses sustained by the seizure of ships and cargoes by the Danish Government in 1807, to proceed to adjudicate upon the claims which they have received, and upon which they have made a report to the Lords of her Majesty's Treasury;" and I beg to say that, knowing the interest that is taken in the motion of which the Honourable Member for the city of London has given notice for this evening, it is with great reluctance that I press myself upon the attention of the House, but I fear that I shall not get another opportunity of bringing forward this subject. I will not detain the House long; I can state the facts to the House in a few minutes; the question is a perfectly simple one. It is not my intention to enter into the particulars of the losses which occurred in 1807. That question was discussed last year, and settled by the opinion of a considerable majority; and as I cannot believe that the House will now consent to rescind the vote to which it came last year, I will not enter into the discussion of that part of the subject, unless I shall be forced to do so by the course which the Chancellor of the Exchequer may pursue this evening. The simple question is, what was the meaning of the vote of last year? As to the meaning of that vote, the Right Honourable Gentleman and myself are at issue. If I am right, the House should follow up the vote of last year by agreeing to my motion. It is well known that several merchants, subjects of this country, suffered losses in consequence of the seizure of their property by the Danish Government in 1807, about the period of the attack on Copenhagen by this country. From time to time the subject has been brought forward, and other persons have put forward their claims, stating that they were entitled to receive compensation for these losses. In 1834, the Government yielded the point, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer (Lord Althorp) stated that he was satisfied of the justice of those claims. In consequence, directions were given to the Commissioners for examining French Claims, to receive and examine the Danish claims. The commissioners considered those directions as empowering them not only to receive these claims, but to investigate them for the purpose of ascertaining whether they were just or unjust. Every one must feel that it was incumbent on them to take that course; what signified it that the parties or the public were informed that there were a certain number of persons who had made claims for compensation to a specific amount, unless they were at the same time informed whether those claims were just or unjust. The commissioners stated that claims had been made amounting to 500,000*l.* or 600,000*l.*, and they adjudicated on about 140,000*l.*, which they had decided were just claims.

There are two separate classes of claimants which the House had determined to be entitled to compensation. The first class consisted of those English merchants who were owed debts, at the time, by Danish subjects, which debts were confiscated, the Danish Government having ordered them to be paid into the public Treasury. Another class consisted of those whose goods on shore were seized. This class was at first objected to; but it was afterwards allowed that theirs constituted a case for investigation. Some of these persons omitted to bring forward their claims within the time allowed by the Order in Council for their so doing; and, in 1837, the Honourable Member for Bridport submitted their case in this House. The Honourable Member for Bridport, on that occasion, moved that an humble Address be presented to her Majesty, praying that her Majesty would be graciously pleased to direct the Danish commissioners to enter upon the examination of those claims. That Address was agreed to, and her Majesty was graciously pleased to comply with its prayer. That instruction must have authorised them to proceed to adjudication, because, on the occasion of that Address, the Chancellor of the Exchequer provided funds for the purpose of meeting those claims. I cannot see any difference, in principle, between the claims of those whose goods were seized and confiscated on shore, and those whose goods were seized and confiscated on board ship, together with the ships on board which those goods were. The House adopted my views in that Address to her Majesty, and I couched my Address in precisely the same terms as those of the Address of the Honourable Member for Bridport. Therefore the instructions were the same; the Treasury minutes were the same, in substance; but the results produced a most extraordinary difference; — whether there were any private instructions, or not, I do not know; but it is most curious, but no less curious than true, to find that the results have been so different. I can understand that there may have been some reason why the House should not be told what the amount of all the claims is, because the House might be terrified by its being a large amount. I would ask the House whether they did, or did not, in their vote of last year, adopt the principle that those who had had their ships seized should be indemnified? — and if so, I ask them to follow up their vote of last year. If we adopt that principle, then I would ask why should we not adopt the course I propose to pursue, — namely, voting an Address to her Majesty, praying that she would be graciously pleased to direct the commissioners to adjudicate upon this class of claims? The Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, upon my asking the question, told me, that he had not directed the commissioners to adjudicate, because the case was very different from that which was then before Parliament. How can the Right Honourable Gentleman presume to put such a construction on our vote? Unless the House is prepared to rescind the vote that it came to last Session, we must follow it up by voting the Address. The Right Honourable Gentleman has said that the present is a very different case, altogether, to the question which was discussed last year. I cannot agree with the Right Honourable Gentleman in that statement. The matter was then very fully discussed; the money was voted; and when a Minister of the Crown took the judgment of the House, and that judgment was against him, I think it was quite uncalled for that he should persevere against the sense of the House. If the present motion shall be granted, then the means will be had, of knowing what the parties are entitled to; and then we shall be enabled to see whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer will say, after two votes against him, that he will not consent to do justice.

Mr. HUTT. — I second this motion.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — Sir, knowing the anxiety of the House to go into the discussion of the great question fixed for this evening, I shall shortly confine myself to the grounds on which, in the execution of my duty, I have directed my course in this matter. I think this matter, however, of so much importance, that I could have wished a night had been specially set apart for its full, calm, and efficient discussion; but the Honourable and Learned Member has not thought proper to do so, and I therefore labour under the disadvantage of attempting to arrest the attention of a House bent on another and more important subject. On a former occasion, I stated my views to the House; but I must now set myself right with the House and the country as to the grounds on which I proposed votes in the estimates for the relief of certain Danish sufferers, and on which I have resisted the claims embraced in the present motion. In the year 1835, I proposed a vote of 113,000*l.* for the relief of the Danish claimants; and in 1836, a vote of 78,000*l.* for the same purpose; and in the estimates for the present year, I proposed a vote of 87,481*l.*; making an entire sum of 278,481*l.* I allude to this fact for the purpose of showing that there has been no unwillingness on my part, if a case were made out, to propose compensation to the sufferers. But there is a difference between those cases in which relief has been granted, and those in which the claims have been resisted. I contended, that, when the wrongs sustained by British subjects had been occasioned by acts of our own, contrary to the usages of civilised European war, the Government, unless they obtained compensation for those wrongs from the foreign country which had inflicted them, were bound to take the responsibility for them on themselves; and in those cases, the Government has so taken the responsibility upon themselves. But with respect to the present class of claimants, the reports of the legal authorities, both in civil and common law, have shown, that this class had not sustained any wrong in consequence of any act which was contrary to the law of nations as known and practised in Europe, but only wrongs arising from the usual and accustomed course of ordinary hostilities. That being so, what is the question opened to the House? Is it to sanction the principle that individual subjects of the Crown, sustaining wrongs or injuries in war, but not such as are contrary to the law of nations, are to come to Parliament and ask for indemnity? If that principle be assented to, where, I beg to inquire, is its application to end? If that principle were assented to, no person living could put a limit, by possibility, to the amount of claims that might be made, in case of war. This is the ground of distinction between the two cases; and I call upon the House to hesitate in taking any step which would affirm the liability of this country in respect of losses sustained from the ordinary acts of warfare, — but above all, in a case where so much time has elapsed. In this proposition a great general principle is involved; but if any doubts existed on this subject, those doubts are turned into certainty by the statement of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman opposite; for the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, because the House affirmed an Address to which the assent of the Crown was not given, appeals to the House whether, in voting that Address, it did not mean and intend to vote the money claimed? That makes a vote of this description still more dangerous; because, the House having been seduced into it, on the ground that it was not intended as a money vote, but as a vote of inquiry, the Honourable mover in the next Session turns round, and, appealing to the generosity of the House, says he did mean a money vote, and then calls upon the House to affirm that proposition. It was but a few days ago that the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth reproved me for encouraging votes of this description, in the case of Mr. Fourdrinier; and the Right Honourable Baronet then told me, if I would take a bolder line in such matters, he would stand by me in asserting the prerogative of the Crown. I hope Honourable Members, opposite, will do so on the present occasion. The Honourable and Learned Member for Liverpool seems to think that, because I did not act with regard to these claims as I had acted in relation to others, the new Address was necessary. Now, I submit, that the two classes are not at all analogous. It is true that there was a majority against me upon the occasion in question; but that majority was for an Address to take this question into consideration, and in the course of the debate I stated my intention to resist the motion in its future stages. And I now give the Honourable and Learned Member notice, that, whatever may be the result of his motion, so long as I have the honour of a seat in this House, I will resist that principle; and, moreover, I will take care that the subject shall be discussed in a full House, with a full knowledge of its importance, and not at a time when Honourable Members, favourable to the claim, are moved to come down to the House by exparte statements of the case, circulated in a printed form among Members, as in the case of a Private Bill. This course has been pursued on the present occasion. The Honourable Gentleman has made one observation, which, forensically, might have been fair, perhaps. He intimated that I had objected to the examination of these claims, in order that the House might not be terrified at the largeness of the total amount claimed. I can assure the Honourable and Learned Gentleman that such was not, in the slightest degree, my motive. I will state my real motive for taking this course; and I entreat the House to consider the hardship that would be produced if they did not abide by it. I am prepared to resist this motion for an Address to the utmost of my power, unless there be, first, a vote of this House directing provision to be made for the purpose of satisfying these disputed claims. Unless something recognising the vote as a money vote be done, I will never consent to place these parties in the position in which those other parties were placed who were included in the estimate which has been already referred to. But until such course be adopted, of what use will it be to enter into an investigation of these claims, subjecting the parties to all the inconvenience of a full trial, that can lead to no result? To proceed to such an investigation would be neither fair, equitable, nor just. Let the Honourable and Learned Gentleman meet this question fairly, and I will be ready to grapple with him. Let him bring forward the matter in such a shape as will raise the question. I cannot give the Queen's assent as to a money vote; but there are, as the Honourable Gentleman will find, forms of Parliament that will enable him effectually to raise the question. If Parliament will vote the amount, I will direct the commissioners to adjudicate. For, to the Government it is, abstractedly, a matter of total indifference, whether the public money is voted by the House to Danes, or Spaniards, or to persons of any other nation.

Sir, I must oppose this motion. To agree to it would be to strengthen the claims of these persons, which, I have already said, I believe to be unfounded. They would, if this Address were agreed to, be in a situation to come to the House and to argue that a money vote must have been intended, or an affirmatory vote would not have been a second time agreed to. If the Honourable and Learned Gentleman brings forward the question again, I give notice that I shall move a call of the House, that there may be a full and deliberate expression of the opinion of the whole House on the subject; and until such deliberate opinion of the House is pronounced on every stage of the proceeding, the Honourable Member for Liverpool will find me a most inflexible opponent. Considering the course proposed by the Honourable and Learned Member to be one that would pledge the House to grant the money required to satisfy these claims, I must give it my most decided opposition.

Mr. HUME. — Sir, I have only a few words to say on the subject. Time has only added, in my opinion, to the claims of these individuals. I consider that the preceding Government acted most unjustly, when, having had in its hands 1,200,000*l.*, it refused to give British subjects, entitled to be reimbursed for their losses, any compensation. The Government recognises the point to this extent, — that if parties can make out that they have claims, those claims are entitled to consideration. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is of opinion that the vote of a former Session did not imply a vote of money. I agree with the Right Honourable Gentleman in that view; but then it implied that inquiry should be made by competent persons to ascertain who are the claimants, and what is the amount of their claims. After that vote I should have considered myself bound not only to receive the claims, but to direct the commissioners to ascertain the nature and the amount of them; nor can I think that justice will be satisfied until that be done. If the Honourable and Learned Gentleman opposite do not know what the claims are, he does perfectly right to try this Address, for the Address, as I understand it, simply prays, in effect, that her Majesty would be pleased to direct an inquiry to be made into the nature of these claims, in order that the House may afterwards take the question into its consideration, whether or not those claims should be paid. If this had been an ordinary war, I am prepared fairly to state that I should think the claimants had no right to come to this House; but if ever there was an extraordinary case in the annals of British history, the conduct of the British Government with respect to Denmark, on the occasion referred to, presents that extraordinary case. From the correspondence which, at the time, took place, it appears that, the merchants having heard rumours of war between England and Denmark, they went to the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the day, to inquire whether England was going to war with Denmark? and the answer they received was, that there was not the least chance of it. And if I understand the claimants, their case is this, — that by that statement from Government, they were misled. If it had been an ordinary case of warfare, every merchant would have been considered bound to insure his ships against the ordinary chances of war; and in that case, if a war had taken place, there would have been no hardship to complain of; but, here, from the statement made by the Government, no ingenuity or attention, on the part of the merchants, could possibly have enabled them to foresee or to provide against the contingency. That circumstance makes the present an extraordinary case. I have no hesitation, therefore, in thinking that, whatever may be the determination of the House as to paying money, it is due to our countrymen, who have been, now, for thirty-two years, kept out of their claims, at least to ascertain if anything be due to them; and now that you have done all you can towards satisfying other claimants, it will be but barely just that you should give your attention to this last class of claimants. It is but right that the Right Honourable Gentleman should not allow a shilling to be paid away till a clear case is made out; but he ought not to oppose a proper inquiry. Fifteen or twenty years ago I advocated this case, when it was but ill received by the House, and almost scouted by the Government of the day. The Right Honourable Gentleman then acted wrongly, as I told him at the time. Injustice has been done throughout; but I hope the House will do justice, now. In supporting this motion, I do not consider that I pledge myself to a money vote, but I consider myself bound to assist in ascertaining what the claims of the parties are; and if 50*l.* or 500,000*l.* be fairly due to them, it will not become the Government of a great country like this, to withhold payment of that which is justly due. The Address I consider to be a proper one to be moved, and I think the Chancellor of the Exchequer ought not to oppose it.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I must confess I feel rather alarmed at the doctrine propounded by the Honourable Member who has just sat down. He stated that this was an extraordinary war, and that it had been commenced in a most unusual manner; and, especially, that, as thirty-two years had elapsed, the claims of the parties more particularly merit the attention of the House. Now I am afraid that, if the House lay down the principle that they are to consider all claims that may be presented to them, and that lapse of time is to be considered an additional recommendation of the claims to the attention of the House, — if the Honourable Member send that forth as an advertisement, — the House will very soon be inundated with claims; and if we were to entertain the present claims, I do not know why claims, of the time of the seven years' war, should not be sent in, — nor, indeed, why claimants should not be found to go back to the time of Charles II. The House of Commons may depend upon it, that, if it entertain these claims for losses in times long gone by, it will very soon have scarcely anything else to do than to hear the merits of claims argued. I hope the House will not continue the discussion of the subject, unless it is prepared to pay millions in the satisfaction of claims of one description or another that may be brought forward.

LORD VISCOUNT SANDON. — I would put the question, at present, on this point,—namely, whether the Chancellor of the Exchequer has acted in accordance with the assurance which he gave to the House on a former occasion? or whether he is not now going in direct variance with that assurance? The Address now proposed is upon the same footing as the Address that was agreed to before, and I think it ought not to be opposed.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — I can assure the House that I believe I am now taking the same course that I have always taken when this question has come under discussion. I am not now prepared to propose an estimate; and therefore I cannot take a different step, at present, to what I before took.

SIR STRATFORD CANNING. — I am ready to admit the principle on which the Right Honourable Gentleman has placed his opposition on this occasion; but still, it is to be recollected that a war expedition was sent out to Denmark, when almost all mankind thought this country was in a state of profound peace with that state; and that that war was undertaken with the utmost secrecy of intention, so that the shipping trade was exposed to unusual danger. Certainly it is but fair, with a view to satisfy the spirit of justice inherent in this country, that inquiries should be entered upon as to these claims.

Mr. GOULBURN. — For myself, Sir, I cannot but adhere to the opinions I have always expressed on this subject. I object to setting the example of listening to these claims. If this precedent were established, applications would be continually made, from time to time, of a similar sort, and every night would be occupied with the discussion of them, and the country would, in fact, be plundered. The Honourable Member for Kilkenny has put it upon this ground,—that the Foreign Office would not tell the merchants whether this country was going to war, or not, with Denmark. I would put it to the House to say whether the Foreign Office was bound to state such a thing to merchants, generally? This proceeding means nothing, unless it means a money vote; and I, for one, must oppose it.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — I wish to ask the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, whether the Foreign Office did not tell the merchants that they were in a perfect state of safety, as far as a war was in question?

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — If the Gallant Colonel wishes to have an answer to that question, he must put it to one who was responsible for what passed at the Foreign Office at that time.

Mr. WARBURTON. — The question before the House is not, whether it is fitting, or not, that money should be granted to these claimants? The only question is, whether reasonable expectation was not held out to them that the commissioners should proceed to inquire whether there was not a certain class of these petitioners whose claims were valid? I think the reasonable interpretation to be put upon the carrying of the motion of last year is, that the commissioners should report which of these claims were to be considered valid. The Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who has opposed the vote to the utmost of his power, has stated that he does not consider that to have been the object or intent of the vote, or that they should be included in the estimates. It would, however, be a second question, whether these claims should be included in the estimates? When that comes before the House for discussion, they can go into the general merits of the question.

Mr. CRESSWELL. — Sir, I cannot pass by the observation of my Right Honourable Friend below me, who has said that, if the present motion be agreed to, these claimants will plunder the country. I cannot understand upon what ground it is stated that those persons whose property was taken from them in consequence of the proceedings of Government, would "plunder the country," when they only seek compensation for the losses they have sustained. It might be said that the Danes, who have taken 1,200,000*l.* of the property of the people of England, have plundered this country; but it is too much to say that the parties who have suffered losses to that extent can be charged with plundering the country, when they claim compensation for their losses. The ground taken by the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, on the present occasion, is precisely the same as that which he took last year. The Right Honourable Gentleman says that subjects are bound to take their chance during a time of war; and he states that these captures were made flagrante bello. I deny that position. The English nation, for great and important purposes, committed an irregular act, by seizing the property of a nation in time of peace. Lord Cathcart stated that he came there as a friend, and he seized the property of the Danes, as he alleged, to prevent its falling into the hands of their enemies. The Danes made reprisals; and, according to the law of nations, this country is bound to make compensation for property so lost by its subjects in such cases.

I challenge any Honourable Member of this House, who knows anything of the law of nations, to deny that principle. The Right Honourable Gentleman, on a former occasion, admitted that very principle; but his argument was, that the property had been lost flagrante bello, — therefore no title to compensation had been made out. Another argument now urged by the Right Honourable the Chancellor of the Exchequer is, that the question should be discussed in a full House. Now, in common fairness, I ask, what could I do more than I have done? I watched my opportunity, and fixed my motion for an early hour, when there was some probability of a full attendance. I selected the very night fixed by the Honourable Member for London to bring forward the question of the Ballot; and if the subject was considered of importance by the Government, why did they not insure a full House to discuss these claims in? Sir, I have brought the question forward as an independent Member. I have done so, not because my constituents are interested in it, but because I am satisfied that the case is a just one; and I assure the House that, otherwise, I should not have advocated it. The captures which were made of the property of British subjects are now matter of history; and I hope the Government will allow its own commissioners to investigate what the amount of these losses is. The Right Honourable Gentleman states that he will oppose the wish of the House so far as he can, and so far he has given fair notice that he will resist the motion as far as he can. That intimation, certainly, cannot hurt me in the least. It is, indeed, an intimation to the House; and if the Right Honourable Gentleman declares that he will resist the wish of the House, that is the affair of the House and the Right Honourable Gentleman, not mine. It is said that the commissioners ought not to adjudicate, lest the parties should be put to expense; and, in the same breath, the commissioners are told to receive evidence, but not to pronounce any opinion, lest it might excite false hopes in the parties claiming. Now, I contend that the Right Honourable Gentleman, having put these parties to the expense of bringing forward their evidence, is the very person who has raised such false hopes. It cannot be supposed that it was mere idle curiosity, or an anxiety to learn precisely the amount of the losses sustained, that induced the commissioners to require evidence on these points. I trust that the hopes which have been excited (in the minds of the parties who lost their property some thirty-two years ago) by the vote of last year, will now be realised.

The House then divided: — Ayes 94; Noes 32; — Majority 62.

Mr. HUTT.—After the very significant indication which has now been, once more, given by the House of Commons, of its opinion on the subject, I think it would only be fair that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should state what course he really intends to pursue with regard to these claims.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — In consequence of the adverse vote which has just taken place, I will take care that there shall be placed on the table of the House a full and entire account of these claims, to the fullest extent to which they can be carried out. Sir, I enter my caveat against any complaints being again made against me upon the subject. Having done so, I will tell the Honourable Gentleman, that I shall still think it my duty to oppose the next step he takes, which must be the proposal of a money vote. I will resist that vote, and I tell the House that, if it vote away the money, it is the public money that it is dealing with. Although the Honourable and Learned Gentleman has carried the Address against me, still I must protest against it; and, until the House carry a money vote to pay these claims, I will be no party to the cause in any way. I feel quite persuaded that there is no Gentleman in this House who imputes to me any motives, or thinks that I am, or have been, actuated by any other motives, in this case, than a deep sense of public duty. The day will come when resistance in matters of this kind will be looked upon in another light; and it will be then found that the House has set a bad example upon this occasion, and that it has too much relaxed the rule. The question can be carried no further, now, than the money vote, and that remains still an open question.

Mr. CRESSWELL. — The Right Honourable Gentleman, in his speech, mentioned something as to the manner of bringing on a money vote. Perhaps, if he will not move it himself, he will initiate me into the secret.

The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER. — No; the Honourable and Learned Gentleman has carried his Address against me. I am not at all desirous of giving him the slightest assistance, and I cannot be so presumptuous as to offer him any hint upon the matter.

PUBLIC WALKS.

Mr. SLANEY. — I now rise, Sir, to move a resolution, — "That it is the duty of the Commons' House of Parliament to take measures to provide public walks in the immediate vicinity of large and populous towns, calculated to promote the health and comfort of the middle and humbler classes." I am aware how anxious the House is to proceed to the important question to be brought forward by the Honourable Member for London; and therefore I assure you, Sir, that I will be as brief as possible in my statement. The population of this country has entirely changed its character within the last thirty-five or forty years; it has increased threefold; and now, many who used to be engaged in agricultural pursuits are congregated in large manufacturing towns, the population of which at present amounts to between three and a half and four millions of people, — mostly of the humbler classes. They are badly lodged, being cooped up, all the week, in cellars and small rooms, situated in narrow lanes; they have no day for enjoyment but the Sunday, and upon that day they are deprived of the benefit of country air, from the want of public places in their neighbourhood. In 1833, a committee sat upon the subject; but although they reported in favour of the adoption of a measure of this kind, nothing has since been done in the matter. If the humbler classes are neglected in this way, can they be otherwise than discontented? and if they are not provided with harmless recreations of this kind, can it be wondered at that they resort to gin-shops and beer-houses? It is the duty of Parliament to contribute to the comfort and happiness of the people by every means in their power; and I am free to admit, that my object in bringing forward this motion is to call the attention of her Majesty's Government to the subject, in the hope that they will take it into their hands. I beg leave, now, Sir, to move the resolution, in the terms I have already stated.

Mr. BROTHERTON. — I second the motion; and I will merely add, that the improvement of the working classes is an object of the highest importance. The country owes them much; and I hope the Government will feel it to be their duty to carry the recommendations of the committee of 1833 into effect.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — I perfectly concur in recognising the necessity of public walks and open spaces for the working classes, in the neighbourhood of large towns; but I cannot see that the resolution before the House advances the object, as it points out or provides no means whatever for its ultimate attainment.

Mr. HUME. — I will only say, that I think the Government ought to take up the question, — for it is one of much importance.

SIR R. INGLIS. — I hope the Honourable Member will not press his motion, as it is so indefinite that many must oppose it who agree in the principle.

Mr. SANFORD. — I must be permitted to observe that the Government have been by no means unmindful of the recommendations of the committee of 1833. They have thrown open the Regent's Park to the public; and in this, and other instances, they have evinced a desire to attend to the interests of the working classes.

Mr. MARK PHILIPS. — I agree that the resolution will not effect the object we have in view, although I am almost at a loss to know in what shape the subject could be properly brought forward. I think Crown lands might be exchanged for land in the neighbourhood of Manchester, Leeds, Birmingham, and other places, for the purpose of establishing public walks there.

SIR R. PEEL. — Sir, I wish to join my request to that of other Honourable Members, that the Honourable Gentleman would not press his motion to a division. I feel, as strongly as any Honourable Gentleman, how important it is to provide public walks in the vicinity of large towns; but I, at the same time, disapprove of abstract resolutions, which can effect no object beyond a general expression of sympathy on the part of this House. I am willing to say that I attach very great importance to this subject; but I think the only safe principle on which we can proceed, is to say we will aid, with the public money, private donations for this purpose. Until, however, we have some details before us, it is impossible that we can properly discuss such a matter; and my opinion is, that the question is one which ought to be undertaken by the Government. By providing places for that species of recreation which would contribute to health and to gratify the people, great benefit would be derived; and I think that this would be the very best means of preventing many annoyances which at present exist.

Mr. SLANEY. — I will not persist in pressing my motion against the sense of the House; but I do trust the matter will be taken up by the Government, without any unnecessary delay.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

THE BALLOT.

Mr. GROTE presented petitions from Leominster, Hereford, Moreton Marsh, and from two individuals, in favour of the vote by ballot.

Mr. BRISCOE presented a petition from Westbury, to the same effect.

Mr. GROTE. — I rise, Sir, to renew the motion, which I have before made in several preceding Sessions, for leave to bring in a Bill providing that the votes at parliamentary elections shall be taken by way of ballot. The many discussions which this subject has already undergone forbid the hope that I can advance much of new argument, or invoke many fresh testimonies in its favour. But I am not deterred by this consideration from again entreating a moderate portion of the time and attention of the House; and while I shall carefully avoid all needless amplification, I shall not think myself obliged to throw aside any relevant or forcible arguments, simply because they have been employed before on the same discussion, and because it is no longer possible to clothe them with freshness or originality; for all historical experience testifies that it is not by the discovery of new positive arguments, and of untrodden ways of demonstration, that political conclusions come to be disseminated, and ultimately acted on; — it is by frequent meditation on the same reasonings, by renewed discussions of the same topic, at proper and seasonable intervals, — and, above all, by the continued and painful sense of the same unremedied evils, — that such results are obtained. It was not by fruitfulness of invention in the field of argument that the advocates of Catholic emancipation won their way to victory: it was by an earnest repetition — often and often enforced — of a case of intrinsic and irresistible justice; but in which every novelty in the way of pleading had been exhausted many years before the final triumph. Such is the gradual method by which, alone, political progress is ever accomplished; and such are the grounds, coupled with my unshaken belief in the goodness of the cause which I am advocating, that induce me again to press upon the House the consideration of the vote by ballot. In one respect, Sir, I approach the subject with an advantage which I have not before enjoyed. It is a satisfaction to me to anticipate that the question of the Ballot will no longer be made a subject of formal opposition by the collective Cabinet; and that the opinions which members of the Government may still express against the Ballot, will be the result of their own individual convictions, not of any express resolution to identify the Cabinet of Lord Melbourne with open voting. If I am asked, Sir, whether the measure which I propose is one calculated to correct all that is amiss, and to supply all that is defective in our present representative system, I answer, without hesitation, that I do not believe it is so. I do not present the Ballot as a measure of any such comprehensive or all-sufficient character. I agree with those who think that our present electoral franchise is too narrow and too unequally distributed; and I shall lend my best support to any proposition for rectifying these evils, by a large extension of the franchise, coupled with a more just and equal proportionment of the constituencies. But, though I am far from pretending that the Ballot is a full remedy against all the defects of our representative system, yet I do affirm — and confidently affirm — that it is a remedy for one of the grossest and most grievous of those defects; — I mean the intimidation and corruption now practised on the legitimate exercise of the franchise. And, with regard to intimidation and corruption, there is this to be remarked, — that many persons who deny the existence of any other evils in the representation as it now stands — many persons who treat the Reform Act as perfect and unalterable in respect to the extension and distribution of the franchise — are yet ready to lament the prevalence of corruption and intimidation, and to admit the necessity of devising some method of combating them. When I hear the emphatic declarations, pronounced by the most powerful and commanding persons in this country, against bribery and coercion at elections, — when I recollect that, a few evenings ago, both the Noble Lord the Member for Stroud and the Right Honourable Gentleman opposite, the Member for Tamworth, vied with each other in the earnestness with which they denounced those unlawful practices, — I certainly might almost have supposed that the object which I seek to attain by my present motion would have procured for me some crumbs of support from both those distinguished persons, instead of receiving their vigorous and unrelaxing opposition.

Sir, I address myself to those who adopt the language of the Noble Lord and the Right Honourable Baronet, and who treat the Reform Act as a final measure — as the permanent settlement of a great constitutional question — or any one of the thousand equivalent phrases by which all idea of farther progress and improvement may be most directly and pointedly negatived, — I address myself to those Gentlemen, and I say to them, "You tell me that the Reform Act is a final measure; do you mean that the intimidation and corruption which now disgrace the operation of it shall be final also? Do you mean to preserve and embalm all these gross deformities, and to make them partakers in that glorious immortality which you promise to the Reform Act as a whole? Was it an understanding between the proposers and the supporters of the Reform Bill, and did it form part of those Tusculan conversations, in 1832, between the Noble Lord the Member for Stroud and Lord Althorp, to which allusion has been made in the Noble Lord's recent pamphlet, when they predicted the future restoration of empire to the Tory party, that intimidation and corruption were to be studiously kept alive for the purpose of neutralising the supposed exorbitancy of democratical principle in the Reform Act?" I do not expect, Sir, to hear it asserted that any such understanding either did exist or could have existed at the period when the Reform Act was first proposed, or that persons who supported that measure were bound by any pledge to discountenance all future remedies against intimidation and corruption. I do not expect, I say, to hear an assertion of this kind formally advanced, though arguments are not unfrequently used which seem tacitly to imply it. Sir, I entertain no faith in that doctrine which proclaims the Reform Act a final measure. I reject, altogether, the notion of the possibility that a franchise so restricted and so ill distributed as the present can be considered as the permanent settlement of a great constitutional question. But yet I will not scruple to contend that Gentlemen who differ with me upon this point may, with perfect consistency, agree with me in supporting the Ballot, unless they consider themselves pledged, not only to the finality of the Reform Act, but also to the finality of intimidation and corruption. Whether you insist upon maintaining the present number of electors, or whether you seek to enlarge it — in either case, protection in the exercise of the franchise is indispensably necessary. I have maintained before, and I now maintain again, that the Ballot is in no sense an enlargement or disturbance of any boundary which has been fixed by the Reform Act; and this is often taken by Radical journals as a ground of exception against it, as if it were something petty and insignificant. In my mind, Sir, this perfect consistency of the ballot with the limits and principles of the Reform Act is neither a ground for preference nor a ground for disparagement. I advocate the ballot on its own merits, as the only corrective of grievous electoral abuses; and I insist upon its congruity with the principles of the Reform Act, because such is the real and literal state of the case. Indeed, it is now matter of history, and has been often before mentioned, that in the first speech of the Noble Lord the Member for Stroud, when he introduced the Reform Bill in 1831, the questions as to the best mode of taking votes, and as to the proper time for the duration of Parliaments, were both expressly set aside and reserved for future consideration.

Well, then, Sir, I shall assume that Gentlemen do really wish to suppress intimidation and corruption — that they do not regard these practices as profitable vices, at once to be denounced and to be upheld — "quod et vetabitur semper et retinebitur" — that they regard them as a real taint and leprosy in our political system, calling for our utmost diligence to heal or to abate; assuming this, I say, where are we to look for a remedy? Has any person ever proposed any other remedy except the Ballot? I should have thought that among those persons who inveigh against coercion of voters, and who, at the same time, reject the Ballot, there would have been found some, at least, who would have applied their minds to the discovery of some other remedy; and that by this time some efficacious scheme would have been devised, adequate to the urgency of the case, and free from the objections advanced against the Ballot. Considering how many times the Ballot has been discussed, and how vehemently it has been opposed, I think that before this time some substitute remedy might reasonably be expected to have been suggested; and I declare, with perfect sincerity, that if any man will teach me any effectual way of banishing corruption and intimidation, and insuring perfect freedom of suffrage under the system of open voting, I am perfectly ready to abandon the Ballot at once. But I persevere in my own proposition, and I shall persevere in it, because no one will provide me with any other remedy in the slightest degree fitted for the exigency of the case. Let me impress upon the House this view of the subject again and again, for it really is the literal truth, — that they have only the option between adopting the ballot and sanctioning the continuance of the present system, with all its unlawful and coercive practices. There is no third course possible; you must take your choice between the evil and this remedy, — for only one remedy has been proposed or conceived; to reject the remedy is tantamount to an acquiescence in the evil. Those who repudiate the Ballot are, in effect, consenting parties to the continuance of intimidation and corruption, without let or hindrance, in all their disastrous abundance, and with all their deplorable consequences, private as well as public.

Surely, Sir, no man of any pretensions to sound and serious reflection — no man, especially, who enjoys a seat in this House, — can allege that interference with the freedom of election is a slight evil, or that the triumph over it is a matter of small importance. And how, Sir, is this triumph to be accomplished? Voters are now intimidated and corrupted — that is, they vote under fear of injury, or under hope of gain, threatened or promised by third parties. Now, I have asserted before, — and I have heard nothing to shake my conviction, — that secret voting is an effectual way of neutralising this mischievous interference. So long as the vote is known, you cannot prevent third parties from making it the condition of reward and punishment; but I defy human ingenuity either to reward or punish an unknown and invisible act. The man who votes in secret can neither fear anything, nor hope anything, in consequence of his vote; neither intimidation nor corruption can be brought to bear upon him, to pervert him from his real inclination and belief, whatever they may be. And, Sir, when I hear so many Gentlemen denouncing the Ballot as a democratical innovation, I am well convinced that they do not, in their hearts, differ with me as to its real effects, however they may chicane as to the steps by which those effects are brought about. In what sense can it be true that the Ballot is a democratical innovation? Those who believe that it is so must imagine that there is a considerable proportion of the existing electors who are inclined to vote democratically, but who dare not do so at present, in consequence of their votes being known to third parties. The Ballot can have no other result except that of liberating these electors from constraint, and enabling them to vote as their own consciences dictate: and this is the reason why it is termed a democratical innovation. Now, Sir, I say that this argument admits, in the fullest extent, the real effects and the remedial tendency of the Ballot, such as I have described them. It is, in fact, an objection against the Ballot, not because it will be ineffectual in preventing intimidation and corruption, but because it will be too effectual in preventing them. It is neither more nor less than a defence, and even a eulogy, of these abuses, as a bulwark against the democratical inclinations and opinions of the present electoral body. I am, therefore, warranted in affirming that even a large proportion of the arguments used against the Ballot, admit its efficacy as a defence of the freedom of election; and that is quite sufficient to make out my case. I desire no better ground for continuing to be its advocate. Let Gentlemen just ask themselves what can be the value of a representative system, if we are to provide no guarantee for freedom and sincerity in voting, and no barrier against the aggressive manœuvres of the corrupter and intimidator? What is the advantage of discussing laboriously the qualification of an elector, and determining who is, and who is not, fit for the franchise, if, after all, you do not obtain the elector's free and real opinion, but the judgment of some one else expressed through his organs? Under any and every arrangement of the franchise, — whether it be maintained as it is now, or enlarged to household or universal suffrage, or determined by an educational qualification, — protection in the exercise of it is absolutely indispensable; and if such protection be left out, the whole business of election becomes nothing better than illusion and mockery. You have given the franchise to a certain description of voters; I now call upon you to complete and seal the gift by the addition of that protective enactment, without which their franchise is treacherous and useless to the country, and often even a misfortune and a curse to themselves. For it is but too notorious, under present circumstances, how little an elector is master of his own conduct on the day of election; it is but too publicly proclaimed, and too painfully felt, how sharp is the pressure of dictation and compulsion from without, and how vigorously every engine of control, as well as of corruption, is set at work during the shock of a contested election. I forbear to cite facts in proof of this assertion, because the general prevalence of the evil has been attested by too many witnesses to leave it any matter of doubt. Nor will I repeat to the House the multiplied narratives which have come even within my own personal knowledge, respecting the treatment of tenants and tradesmen and other electors in dependent circumstances, when the fatalmoment arrives at which their franchise can be made to serve the purpose of ambitious superiors. If you are to have any representative Government at all in England, you must have multitudes of electors in dependent circumstances; the distribution of property in England forbids any other supposition. To expect from these men, unprotected as they are by the Legislature, the constant sacrifice of their worldly interest to the preservation of a political conscience — to expect that you will find generally in their bosoms, such as richer and more accomplished men do not exhibit in their own persons — would be little better than an idle dream. I envy not the feelings of any man who can have engaged in the details of electoral struggle, without a profound sense of the miseries of an unsheltered franchise, and a sincere desire to apply to them an efficacious remedy. Much talk has recently been current, Sir, respecting an impending dissolution of Parliament within no very long period of time. How far such anticipations are likely to be realised, of course, I cannot pretend to say; though, certainly, in the condition of something like "stalemate," to which parties have been brought in this present House, no one can affirm that that event is improbable. But I will confess that the possibility of a general election at no distant date increases my anxiety again to submit this question to the judgment of the House. This is not merely because the subject of the Ballot is one which is regarded with warm interest among a large proportion of the constituencies, and because it is therefore fit that the sentiments of Gentlemen in this House should be tested and proclaimed, either for or against its adoption: it is still more for another reason; — that the proposition of the Ballot has an express and peculiar bearing on the business of election, and that the supposed eve of a general election is a fit season for renewing my protest against those mischiefs and enormities which are inseparable from open voting. Recollecting, as I do, the phenomena of the two last general elections, I cannot permit the repetition of the same intolerable abuses, without again tendering the only remedial proposition which is calculated effectually to subdue or abate them. It is fit that those who acutely feel the dishonour which is thrown upon our public institutions, and the mischiefs which are entailed upon individuals, by the prevalence of corruption and intimidation, — and I believe the number of those persons to be great and increasing, — it is fit that they should be reminded, that if these disorders continue, it is only because the Legislature declines to avail itself of the proper tutelary provisions within its reach. Sir, I do believe that freedom of election, though in practice it is foully trampled upon, is yet a sacred idea, and an object of sincere inward attachment, among the general public. However powerful men may assert the monstrous privilege of dictating votes to those who are poorer than themselves, — however election agents may pride themselves on their skill in hunting down irresolute or reluctant voters, — however much the practical working of contested elections may exhibit compulsory disunion between the vote and the conscience, — still I am persuaded that the right of the country to a free and conscientious expression of opinion from every qualified elector, poor as well as rich, and the right of the elector himself to express such opinion at the poll, without hinderance or injury, is among the most deeply rooted of all our national convictions. To convert this right from a cherished fiction into a useful reality, is the charm and the virtue of the Ballot. If you refuse the Ballot, you virtually discountenance free and public-minded voting; you decree the continued reign of corruption and intimidation; you nourish and keep alive the poisonous taint which infects the life-blood of our representative system. Against this poison, the Ballot is the only antidote, and as such I commend it to your favourable decision. I know not whether you will reject it now; but I feel well assured that you will not reject it long. It now only remains for me to move, "That leave be given to bring in a Bill to provide that the votes at elections for Members of Parliament be taken by way of ballot."

> That strong divinity of soul

LORD WORSLEY. — Sir, in rising to second the motion, I beg to say that I differ, in one point, from the Honourable Member who has just sat down, — namely, with regard to the extension of the franchise; but I am decidedly of opinion that it is necessary that we should in some way protect the voters to whom we have given the franchise by the Reform Bill. If we do not so protect them, the House will not long retain the confidence of the people. My firm impression is, that if we much longer refuse to give electors the power of voting in the way which their conscientious opinions dictate, we shall find the same discontent in the public mind with our proceedings which existed when I first came into Parliament, before the Reform Bill was carried. I believe that the parties asking for the Ballot, in order that they may be enabled to vote honestly, — and who consider that they have not, at present, the power of giving their suffrages to the candidate whom they think most fit to represent them, — will, if that reasonable request be denied to them, consider that the Reform Bill has not given them real representation. The first time that I had the honour of addressing the House was, I believe, when the Reform Bill was under discussion. I then represented a constituency which I had never seen, containing, I believe, some seven and twenty voters. I thought it necessary that such places should cease to send Members. I thought it necessary that the representatives of the country should be returned by such voters as would give confidence to those who had no votes; and therefore I thought it necessary to extend the suffrage, then, for the purpose of giving that confidence. And now, I cannot help thinking that, if that has failed in preventing intimidation and corruption, we have not much bettered the condition of the country. It is no improvement, if we have come, in a different way, to misrepresent the real opinion of the people. I have heard it said, that there are some who suppose that I have been requested to second this motion by some Member of the Government. Sir, I have not been so requested. I have not been requested, either by the Government, or by my constituents; for I must honestly say—as I do not wish in this House to misrepresent in the slightest degree the wishes of my constituents—that if an election were now to take place in my own county by the present mode of open voting, I do not believe their decision would be in favour of the Ballot. But I think it necessary that some protection should be given to the voter, because, as the Honourable Member for London says, the evils are admitted in all the discussions upon the subject; but no remedy for them, except the Ballot, has yet been proposed. Precisely the same objections are made to the Ballot that were made to the Reform Bill. It was denied that the Reform Bill would remedy abuses. It was acknowledged that there were abuses; but it was said that the Reform Bill was revolutionary; and its opponents prognosticated all sorts of evil from its adoption. The other day, a Gentleman who was in the House when the Reform Bill was brought forward, told me that he, himself, then believed that it would be inevitably followed by a repeal of the law of primogeniture. It was said that the cases of intimidation, adduced as grounds for the Ballot, are very much exaggerated,—that persons are very often turned out of farms for bad farming, who represent themselves as having been dispossessed for voting independently. I admit that that may sometimes be the case. But those persons would not make such an excuse, nor would they have the sympathies of the public with them, if the notoriety of the practice did not give this story some colour of plausibility. It is said, also, that there is great exaggeration with regard to the losses which tradesmen suffer,—that where they lose Tory customers, they gain Whig ones. That, too, might happen occasionally. It is added, that a tradesman who quietly gives his vote, and does not meddle in politics farther, does not suffer. But, Sir, I ask, is it to be said that a person, because he is a tradesman, is not to take part in politics? Assuredly, he has as much right as any other man to do so? With regard to intimidation in the counties, my impression is, that the Ballot would prevent it, inasmuch as when it is not known how a person intends to vote, or how he has voted,—(and no one denies that the Ballot would secure secrecy in the act of voting),—it is impossible to know when to visit him with punishment. But I am aware that the objection which weighs with many persons, particularly in my own county, against the Ballot, is, that it would lead to universal suffrage, and, ultimately, to the repeal of the corn laws. That is the objection in my county. But, if I though, it could lead to such results, I certainly would not support the vote by ballot.

[Cheers.]

Now there is a case, which I have never heard mentioned, but which I know has had a very great influence at elections,—(probably the Honourable Member for London did not like to mention it),—I mean the case where bankers in the country prevent persons exercising their votes who are under obligations to their banks. I merely mention the case of bankers, to show that intimidation is practised by more classes than one. It is rather curious, in looking at the different divisions which have taken place on the Ballot, to observe how the numbers in its favour have increased. In 1830, when the Honourable and Learned Gentleman the present Member for Dublin (then Member for Clare) moved that votes be taken by way of ballot at East Retford, he found only 21 Members to support him. In 1833, when the Member for London made his motion for the Ballot, the minority in its favour was 106. In 1834, upon the motion that votes be taken by way of ballot at Hertford, the minority was 82. In 1835, the same motion that is now made was supported by 144. In 1836, when the division took place unexpectedly at an early hour, the minority was 88. In 1837, it was 153; and, in 1838, 198. Sir, after what I have stated to be the opinion of my constituents, it may be said that I am not justified in seconding the motion. It so happened, that I voted before the last election against the Ballot; and seeing reason for changing my opinions, I thought it to be my duty before the election to go through my county; and though I did not at the time see any likelihood of any opposition to my return, still I thought it right to inform the electors that I, who hitherto had been opposed to the Ballot, intended for the future to support it. I did that six weeks before the election, so that it is not to be supposed that I have changed my opinions without the knowledge of my constituents. I am aware this statement will be of advantage to the Honourable Gentlemen opposite; at the same time I do not wish to make the House believe that I have taken so decided a part in the debate because I am the representative of a large constituency. I did, indeed, hope that the system of intimidation would not be persisted in; but this hope has been defeated. It was acknowledged by every Member who spoke in the debate of last year, that intimidation was still practised. Under these circumstances, then, I hope that the House will be prepared to act when a remedy is proposed for this evil. The Noble Lord the Secretary of State has offered to do something; but then a change in the mode of registration will not, alone, remedy the evil. I am satisfied, if there be not a remedy applied in the shape of the Ballot, that there are men who now have votes who would be most anxious to have their votes taken from them. But, then, it may be said, why are these men registered? If a man be registered, and not opposed, he continues on the registry; — a man cannot help being put on by the landlord; and it would often be quite as dangerous for the tenant to have his name taken off the registry, as for him to refuse his vote at the election. I admit that there are many acts done on the part of the landlord, of which he has not any knowledge. Possibly this does not make the case any better; but such I believe to be the fact. I know, for instance, this case — connected with the steward of a near connection of my own. I asked this steward how the tenants of a certain landlord who was abroad would vote? — to which the man replied that they would of course all vote with their Tory landlord. I asked the steward how that could happen, when the landlord was not in the country at the time? and why they should not be allowed to vote as they pleased? To this the steward replied, that on canvassing the tenants he would not think of claiming their votes from the 40*s.* freeholders; that they might give their votes as they pleased; but that he did claim the votes of the 50*l.* tenants at will; and that he could not think he did his duty to the landlord if he permitted those who claimed a vote by reason of their renting land from the landlord not to give to the same landlord their vote. The steward who said this, I must add, was an excellent and a very conscientious man, and, I believe, really thought it was his duty to act in the manner I have just described. I am not one of those who think that vote by ballot would take away the legitimate influence of property. I am not in the habit of addressing the House; but I think it right, now, to read to them an extract from a speech of a Noble Lord, to whom Honourable Gentlemen used to listen in this House with great attention. That Noble Lord (Lord Althorp) stated, upon a discussion of the same kind as this, what he believed with respect to the Ballot, and its affecting the due influence of property. Upon that occasion, Lord Althorp said, —

> There is no man in the House more sorry than I should be to see the legitimate power of the aristocracy put an end to. For what is that power? The influence of affection and of kindness. The power of property is always legitimate, when it is solely a power over the affections of those around us; but there is sometimes another influence arising from it, namely, that of intimidation, and of preventing persons from voting by reason of their fears. I do not see how election by ballot can diminish the legitimate influence of the aristocracy; but, at the seme time, I do not see how it would allow the exercise of the illegitimate influence of fear.

This, too, is my opinion; and if it were not so, it is not at all likely that I should be so anxious for its success. I firmly believe that if an effectual remedy be not proposed for those abuses, it will be believed that those who voted for the Reform Bill were not sincere in their wishes for a fair representation of the people; while it will be said that those who originally opposed the Reform Bill, and now proclaim their intention to abide by its provisions, only mean to avail themselves of its abuses, — and the sincerity of their declarations will not, therefore, be believed by the country.

On the question being put, —

Mr. GASKELL said: — Sir, there was one position laid down by my Honourable Friend the Member for London in which I most fully concur. My Honourable Friend said, that on no former occasion has this question excited such interest in the public mind as at the present moment. On that point I concur with my Honourable Friend; but I trust that no one who has hitherto been unconvinced by argument, will suffer himself to be deterred either by the course which the Government is about to take, or by any inflammatory appeals which may be made to him out of doors, from a manly discharge of his duty to his country on this occasion. There appear to me to be three opinions upon this question. The first is the opinion so ably and honestly advocated by my Honourable Friend the Member for London. The second is an opinion which, I believe, is entertained by many Honourable Gentlemen on the benches opposite, — and among them, I rather think, by my Noble Friend the Member for Lincolnshire, — that the Ballot is a question of secondary importance only, and that its probable effects, both for good and for evil, are greatly overrated. The third opinion — which is entertained, I believe, by the great bulk of the people of England, and by a still greater majority of their representatives —is, that a secret system of voting is at variance with all their ordinary habits and feelings, inconsistent with the whole framework of their institutions, and calculated, if adopted, to inflict a deadly blow both on the stability of the constitution and on the character of the people who live under it. I am well aware that my Honourable Friend the Member for London entertains a very different opinion, and that he is quite sincere in the maintenance of it. I honour the ability and admire the single-mindedness with which my Honourable Friend has so long advocated the expediency of secret voting. But, with a large proportion of those who now so loudly clamour for the Ballot, I believe that protection is the pretext, whilst ascendancy is the real object at which they aim. "Speciosa verbis, re inania aut subdola, quantoque majore libertatis imagine tegebantur, tanto eruptura ad infensius servitium." Undoubtedly, if the elective franchise were the inherent right of every individual, of which he could not be deprived without injustice, I could understand the arguments employed by the advocates of the Ballot. But that is a position which cannot be taken up even by the advocates of the Reform Bill, for they have not made the franchise universal. I therefore have a right to assume that the Legislature has confided the franchise to the 10*l.* householder, not as a privilege for his own benefit, but as a trust for the benefit of the state; and if the franchise be a trust for the benefit of all, I have yet to learn on what principles of justice you can debar the public from marking the manner in which it is exercised. I have listened on this occasion, as I have listened on former occasions, with the greatest attention, to the speech of my Honourable Friend the Member for London; and it appears to me that his whole case rests on the unproved assumption that the blind and unreasoning will of the numerical majority of the electors ought to govern the country. From that doctrine I totally dissent. Indeed, I cannot take a single step in company with my Honourable Friend. I differ with him not only as to the end, but also as to the means of good government; for I imagine that nothing could be more destructive to the principles of the constitution, than that any set of men should exercise, under it, an uncontrolled and irresponsible power. It likewise appears to me that you would place Members of Parliament in this House in a very invidious position by establishing the vote by ballot. You would deprive them of all intercourse with their supporters. You would sever the ties which connect them with their friends and tenants. You would deprive them of that protection which they stand at least as much in need of, from the pressure of undue influence from without, as the voter requires it, from the arbitrary exercise of power. Sir, I ask, are not Members of the House of Commons to exercise their functions publicly? They are, most undoubtedly; and I, for one, do not complain of such an objection, for I will never conceal any vote which I may give, either in a polling booth, or in the House of Commons. What I mean to say is, that every reason for secret voting at the hustings is equally good for secret voting in the House of Commons.

[Cries of "Oh!"]

Observe, I am not maintaining that any arguments of mine are decisive against the Ballot — I am only urging them to show that a project like this, which would introduce a great change into our institutions, ought not to be adopted on light grounds. What, I will ask, are the arguments on which the House is called upon to depart from every acknowledged principle of the constitution? We have heard it stated, that bribery and intimidation prevail throughout the country to an enormous extent; and that for such practices the only remedy is the Ballot. Now, the proposition, that the Ballot would be effectual in suppressing corruption, is a proposition so extraordinary, that I can scarcely believe the Honourable Members who advance it are serious in their use of it. If my Honourable Friend had contented himself with saying that the Ballot would prevent the open sale of votes,

Digitized by Google

I could have understood what my Honourable Friend meant; but, surely, my Honourable Friend cannot seriously venture to assert that it would put an end to secret corruption. But the Ballot has been tried as a mode of checking corruption before now, and has failed utterly.

[Cries of "Name where!"]

As I am so pointedly called on, I will name where. It was tried at Rome, for 85 years, and failed utterly.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

It was tried, also, in the Italian republics; and there, too, it failed utterly.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!" and cheers.]

It has been tried, too, in the United States ——

[Cries of "Oh, oh!"]

— and what say the professed patrons of republican institutions as to its success there? It is said by an authority to which, I suppose, some of the Gentlemen opposite who cheer so loudly will be disposed to attach credit — it is said by Miss Martineau ——

[Loud laughter, and cries of "Oh, oh!"]

— it is said by that lady, that "the constituencies of America are generally corrupt; that any reasons might be urged for their votes, rather than the dictates of their conscience; that a general indifference prevails among them with respect to the fulfilment of their political duties; and that if they are ashamed of their mode of discharging the functions of public life, they ought also to be ashamed of undertaking them." I am not, however, attributing corruption to the Ballot; all I contend for is, that the Ballot has an inevitable tendency to extend it. For, frame what laws you please, as long as there are ambitious men who are rich, and as long as there are avaricious men who are poor, so long will you have men who will strain every nerve to evade them. I am not prepared to deny the prevalence — or I should rather say, the existence — of intimidation at elections. Wherever instances of it occur, I deplore them; but they constitute the exception, and not the rule. I believe that, in every nine cases out of ten, the connection between the landlord and the tenant is one of pride on both sides; and that, if the question were put to the tenant, he would be the first to repudiate the boon offered to him by this Bill. I avow that I do not wish to see men free from external influence in the discharge of their public duty.

[Cries of "Oh!"]

And even if I entertained such a wish, I should not be inclined to adopt a remedy which is calculated to sow the seeds of destructive mischief in our constitution. I believe that it is by the exercise of that influence which my Honourable Friend opposite would destroy, and by the example of that character which my Honourable Friend would remove, that our constitution is preserved and rendered immoveable. In times of excitement, indeed, the usual ties between landlords and tenants may be disregarded; but in ordinary times I know that tenants are unwilling to run counter to their landlords. So far am I from considering that as an evil, that I regard it as high praise of the constitution of society amongst us; I look upon it as the best practical tribute to the practical working of our admirable form of civil government; and I do believe that if you take away or diminish the due and legitimate influence of property, you do much to weaken the stability of the mixed form of government in this country. But it is said that, when this influence is exerted too freely, it prevents the representation from being the mirror of the elective body. But a mirror too closely breathed upon must soon become dim, and a House of Commons which is the mere delegate of the people will soon cease to be the representative of the people and intelligence of the country. I have no wish to see property deprived of its just influence in the return of Members to Parliament. I recollect that Mr. Burke, in his celebrated Reflections on the French Revolution, said, that "as property is sluggish, inert, and timid, it never can be safe from the invasions of ability, unless it is out of all proportion predominant in the representation." He also contended that "it must be represented in large masses of accumulation, or that it would not be rightly protected;" and he concluded by stating, that "let the large proprietors be what they would, — and they had their chance of being among the best, — they were, at the very worst, the ballast in the vessel of the commonwealth." The same opinions were expressed by the Whigs of the present day, so late as the year 1831. I was not at that time a Member of the House; but I remember well the reply which was made by the Lord Advocate for Scotland to the argument used by Mr. Croker, that the influence of property would be destroyed by the Reform Bill. That Learned Lord said, "In no quarter is it contended that property ought not to have a large influence in the return of Members to Parliament; but my complaint against the old system is, that it removes a large proportion of the old boroughs from the legitimate influence of the property by which it is surrounded." I hope that the opinions of the Cabinet of Earl Grey have not been discarded by the Cabinet of Lord Melbourne.

I confess that I have of late rejoiced exceedingly at finding the Noble Lord the Member for Stroud hoisting the constitutional banner, — and avowing to his constituents, that if they wish for further changes in the constitution, they must not expect him to be their leader, nor look to him for support. I hope that the Noble Lord, when he was expressing that opinion, was expressing the opinion of an undivided Cabinet; and that the Right Honourable Members for Nottingham, for the West Riding of Yorkshire, and for Manchester, are fully convinced of the danger of hazarding those changes which their Noble Leader opposes. If they are not so convinced, then the House will have reason to regret that the Noble Lord has perilled his fair fame by remaining in a Cabinet divided on so important a topic. Then we may say to him, as he said in the year 1835 to the Honourable Baronet the Member for Kent, — "Nusquam tuta fides." It has been said, moreover, that the Ballot is demanded by the voice of the people. Indeed! why we have had but five or six petitions in favour of it.

[Cries of "Oh, oh!" from the Ministerial benches.]

True, there have been petitions from Leominster and Westbury; but those petitions can never be considered as speaking the sense of the people of England. To use a phrase of Burke's, we are not, "because half a dozen grasshoppers under a fern are making the field ring with their importunate chink, whilst thousands of great cattle, reposing beneath the shade of the British oak, are chewing the cud and are silent," — we are not, I say, on that account to imagine that "those who make the noise are the only inhabitants of the field, or that, after all, they are other than the little shrivelled, meagre, hopping, the loud and troublesome insects of the hour." If there were any real apprehension in the country that this question will be conceded, the table would be covered with petitions against the vote by ballot; but the people of England entertain no such apprehension. If this House should, unhappily, be induced to adopt this revolutionary measure from a morbid desire of popularity, then, Sir, in my conscience, I believe that they will strike a fatal blow against the civil liberties of the nation.

Mr. T. B. MACAULAY.—I could have wished it had been in my power to give a silent vote on the present question; but the deep interest which I take in the success of the motion, and my sense of what I owe to that large and respectable portion of my constituents whose voices have sent me to this House, induce me to seize an opportunity of expressing the opinions which I have formed on this subject. But before I make any remarks upon the question immediately before the House, I wish to advert, for a short time, to one topic which has excited the greatest interest throughout the country, and to which the Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down has made some very sarcastic, and not, I think, exceedingly well-judged, allusions. It is generally understood that her Majesty's Ministers have determined that the question of the Ballot shall be an open question; that all the members of the Government shall be free to speak and vote on that question according to their individual opinions. It is natural that this determination should excite censure on the one side of the House, and applause on the other. For my own part, I must say that, without any reference whatever to my own opinion on this particular question, I am inclined, on higher and more general grounds, to approve of the determination of the Government. I rejoice to see the number of open questions increasing.

[Renewed cries of "Hear, hear!"]

I rejoice to see that we are returning to the wise, the honest, the moderate maxims which prevailed in this House in the time of our fathers and grandfathers.

[Laughter from the Opposition, and cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial Members.]

I say that the practice of the House in this respect has undergone, in very recent times, a great change. I believe that another change is now taking place, and that we are reverting to a more prudent and rational system.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and, "Oh, oh!"]

To what precise extent it is desirable that the Ministers of the Crown should act in strict concert together in Parliament on the various legislative questions that come under consideration, is an exceedingly nice question ——

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and laughter from the Opposition benches.]

—a question to which, so far as I am aware, no rigid and strictly drawn rule can be applied.

[Renewed laughter, and cries of "Oh!" from the Opposition benches.]

Honourable Gentlemen on the other side, who laugh, no doubt, possess a great advantage over me; they are probably aware of much that may have passed during the last four or five years on this subject, with which I am unacquainted. But I am not aware that any speculative or practical statesman has ever been found, either in writing or speaking, to take any distinct line on this subject, and to trace out a definite line of action; for the observance of political prudence in all cases is, I believe, difficult, and perhaps impossible. It is perfectly plain, however, that there are but three courses possible, with respect to the conduct of Ministers in dealing with legislative questions: either they must agree on all questions whatever; or they must pretend to agree where there is a real difference; or they must have open questions, and leave each individual member of their body to take the course which his own opinion and inclination may dictate. Now, that there should be a perfect agreement between Ministers on all questions, we know to be impossible. This is not my expression; it is the expression of one who was, for a long time, the brightest ornament of this House—Lord Chatham. That great man said,—

> Talk of divided houses! Why, there never was an instance of a united Cabinet! When were the minds of twelve men ever cast in one and the same mould?

We know that, even if two men are brought up together from childhood,—if they follow the same course of study, mix in the same society, communicate their sentiments to each other, on all topics, with perfect freedom, and exercise a mutual influence in forming each other's mind,—a perfect agreement between them, on political subjects, can never be expected. How, then, is it possible that this agreement can subsist between a Cabinet of several persons imperfectly acquainted with each other? Every Government—I speak neither of the present Government, nor of the late Government, nor of the Government which seemed about to be formed the other day—is constructed in such a manner that forty or fifty gentlemen, some of whom have never seen each other's faces till they are united officially, and who have perhaps been in hot opposition to each other all their lives,—are brought into intimate connection. I mean to cast no reflection whatever on either side of the House; but such is the general character of all Governments, and complete unanimity in any is out of the question—would, in fact, be an absolute miracle. Only two courses, therefore, remain. Either there will be a semblance of unanimity, where unanimity really is not, or each person must be left to act on his own opinions. I do not profess any extraordinary degree of prudery on matters of political morality. I am perfectly aware that, in Parliament, it is impossible anything great can be done without co-operation; and I am aware that there can be no co-operation without mutual confidence. I admit, therefore, that men are justified, when united into a party, either in office or in opposition, in making mutual concessions,—in opposing measures which they might, as individuals, think desirable,—in assenting to those which they might consider objectionable, and giving their votes, not with reference to the mere terms of the question put from the chair, but with reference to the general state of political parties. All this I admit. If there be any person who thinks this wrong, I respect the tenderness of his conscience, but I would say that that person's vocation is not for a public life. That person should select a quieter path for his passage through life; one in which he might play a useful and respectable part; but he is as completely unfitted for the turmoils of political strife as a Quaker, by his religious principles, is prevented from undertaking the command of a regiment of horse. But although I thus far admit the principle of party combinations, I must also admit that they may be carried too far — that they have been carried too far. That a Member of the House should say "No!" to a proposition which he believes to be essentially just and necessary,—that he should steadily vote, through all its stages, in favour of a Bill that he believes would have pernicious consequences, — is conduct which, I should think, could not be defended. Such a course of action is not reconcileable to a plain man, whose notions of morality are not drawn from the language of casuists. I only defend the principle of mutual action among political partisans, as being a peculiar exception from the great general rules of political morality; and it is clear that an exception from the great rules of political morality should be most strictly construed, — that it should not be needlessly extended, — and, above all, that it should not be converted into the rule. Therefore I say that, in a Government, any concession of opinion which is not necessary to the efficient conduct of affairs, to cordial co-operation, is to be looked upon as unjustifiable. In saying this, I am not pleading for any innovation; I am attacking a modern basis of action, and recommending a return to the sounder and better maxims of the last generation. Nothing is more common than to hear it said, that the first time a great question was left open was when Lord Liverpool's Administration left the Catholic question an open question. Now, there cannot be a grosser error. Within the memory of many persons living the general rule was this; — that all questions whatever were open questions in a Cabinet, except those which came under two classes, — namely, first, measures brought forward by the Government as a Government, which all the members of it were, of course, expected to support; and, secondly, motions brought forward with the purpose of casting a censure, express or implied, on the Government, or any department of it, which all its members were, of course, expected to oppose. I believe that I lay down a rule to which it will be impossible to find an exception: I am sure I lay down a general rule when I say that, fifty years ago, all questions not falling under these heads, were considered open.

Let Honourable Gentlemen run their minds over the history of Mr. Pitt's Administration. Mr. Pitt, of course, expected that every gentleman connected with him by the ties of office should support him on the leading questions of his Government — the India Bill, the resolutions respecting the commerce of Ireland, the French commercial treaty. Of course, also, he expected that no gentleman should remain in the Government who had voted for Mr. Bastard's motion, of censure on the naval administration of Earl Howe, or for Mr. Whitbread's motion on the Spanish armament; but, excepting on such motions, brought forward as attacks on the Government, perfect liberty was allowed to his colleagues, — and that, not merely on trifles, but on constitutional questions of vital importance. The question of parliamentary reform was left open; Mr. Pitt and Mr. Dundas were in favour of it, Lord Mulgrave and Lord Grenville against it. On the impeachment of Warren Hastings, likewise, the different members of Government were left to pursue their own course; that Governor was attacked by Mr. Pitt, and defended by Lord Mulgrave. In 1790, the question whether the impeachment should be considered as having dropped, in consequence of the termination of the Parliament in which the proceedings were commenced, was left an open question; Mr. Pitt took one side, and was answered by his own Solicitor General and by Sir J. Scott, afterwards Lord Eldon. The important question respecting the powers of juries in cases of libel was left open; Mr. Pitt took a view favourable to granting them extensive powers, Lord Grenville and Lord Thurlow opposed him. The abolition of the slave trade was also an open question; Mr. Pitt and Lord Grenville were favourable to it, Mr. Dundas and Lord Thurlow were among the most conspicuous defenders of the slave trade. All these instances occurred in the space of about five years. And are they not sufficient to prove how absurdly and ignorantly those persons speak, who tell us that the practice of open questions is a mere innovation of our own time? There are men now living — great men, whom I hold in honour and reverence, — Lord Grey, Lord Wellesley, Lord Holland, and others, — who well remember that, at an early period of their public life, the four questions of impeachment, the law of libel, the slave trade, and parliamentary reform were all open questions, supported by one section of the Cabinet and opposed by another. Was this the effect of any extraordinary weakness or timidity on the part of the statesman then Prime Minister? No; Mr. Pitt was a man whom even his enemies and detractors always acknowledged to be a minister who possessed a manly, brave, and commanding spirit. And was the effect of this policy to enfeeble his Administration, to daunt its adherents, to render them unable to withstand the attacks of the Opposition? On the contrary, never was there an Administration which, on party questions, presented a firmer or more serried front to Opposition. And the firmness of his followers is to be ascribed, in a great measure, to the liberty they enjoyed. We have had an opportunity of comparing the results to which the two different systems led. Formerly questions arose, on which two or more members of the Cabinet took different sides; a reasonable difference of opinion was allowed, and the stability of Government was not impaired: but now, as soon as any Minister declares that he cannot coincide with another on a question of any importance, the Cabinet is broken up. We all recollect that, in 1828, the Government of the Duke of Wellington was deprived of the services of several persons of distinguished ability, in consequence of a difference for which, I firmly believe, not one of Mr. Pitt's colleagues would have thought of resigning. The line has been drawn, of late, with overstrained strictness, and I am glad to see that better maxims are now gaining ascendancy. I am satisfied that her Majesty's Ministers will find that, by taking this course on the present question, they have increased their strength and raised their character.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

And now to come to the particular question before the House. I shall vote for the motion of the Honourable Member for the city of London; and I wish to explain, that, in doing so, I merely understand myself to be recording a declaration in favour of the principle of secret voting. I desire to be understood as reserving to myself the right of withholding my support from any Bill which, on examining its details, shall not appear to me to provide a machinery that will secure secrecy and prevent fraud and intimidation; and I must reserve to myself the right of considering how far I can, with propriety, give my support to any Bill which shall not be either accompanied or preceded by some measure for improving the mode of revising the registration. I should think it most disingenuous to give a popular vote, saddled with conditions which I thought either impossible or exceedingly difficult of fulfilment. Such is not my opinion with regard to those which I have mentioned. I entertain no doubt that it is possible to provide a machinery which will protect the interests both of the voter and the country, by insuring all the secrecy of which the transactions of human life will admit. And I have as little doubt that it is possible to devise a tribunal whose decisions before the election shall command as much public confidence as the decisions of the committees of this House after election.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and laughter.]

Subject to these two conditions, I give my support to this motion for establishing the vote by ballot. But I cannot say that I do so on all the grounds on which many of the supporters of the Ballot rest their case. I by no means consider, as many of them appear to do, that it is a question respecting which all the arguments urged are upon one side, and that there can be no set-off to the great advantages that may result from the adoption of secret voting. So embarrassing appear to me the difficulties that beset the subject, that I am not surprised that many wise and virtuous men should have arrived at a conclusion differing from my own. In this, as in every other question that can test the prudence and experience of men, we must expect to find a balance of good and evil. And, first, I will admit that secrecy would withdraw the voter from the influence of some good as well as some bad motives. I admit that it would take away the salutary check of public opinion, as well as the pernicious influence of intimidation. But I am compelled to take refuge in the Ballot—and select that which, to the best of my judgment, is the least of two evils. I am not sure that I quite agree with the Honourable Member for the city of London in thinking that it would be an entire preservative against bribery; on that point, I confess, I am inclined to dissent from the Honourable Member.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition.]

In small constituent bodies I think that bribery, under a system of secret voting, would continue to exist, though, at the same time, without any material aggra-vation. But I support the Ballot chiefly on this ground, — I consider it as the specific, the only remedy for the monstrous evils of intimidation.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

There was a time when — like the Noble Lord who seconded the motion of the Honourable Member for London — I was inclined to think that this evil, like many others which had yielded to the force of public opinion and the progress of intelligence, would die a natural death. That hope I have been compelled to relinquish; I believe the evil to be a growing evil; I am satisfied that it has considerably increased within the last seven years, and I believe it has increased within the last three years. I cannot disguise from myself that the growth of this evil is in some measure to be imputed to the Reform Bill; and, in saying this, I impute to the Reform Bill only that imperfection which is common to it with every other great measure. The reformation of the church has produced classes of social and moral evil unknown in the times of the Plantagenets. The revolution has produced descriptions of abuse unknown in the times of the Stuarts: and I believe that the Reform Bill, though on the whole it has conferred great blessings on the country, has, like the great changes which I have mentioned, produced some new evils, and aggravated others of old standing. It has swept away many abuses; but it seems to me to have given new life and more malignant energy to those which it spared. It has stopped up many of the channels of corrupt influence; but within those which it did not stop the stream not only runs on, but runs deeper, stronger, fouller than ever.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!"]

If it does not destroy, it at least restricts within narrow limits the ancient practice of nomination; but, by doing so, I believe it has given a new impulse to the spirit of intimidation, — and that, too, at the very moment when it conferred the franchise on thousands of electors who were placed precisely in that situation in which they were most liable to the influence of terror. I cannot close my eyes to the evidence of these evils, accumulated from all quarters: if any credit can be given to the outcries which have been raised in every quarter of the kingdom, not — by one party only, but by Tories, Whigs, and Radicals, — from England, Scotland, and Ireland, — I must believe that there are now sitting in this House Gentlemen who owe their seats to votes extorted by fear.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches, repeated from the Opposition.]

And I say that if there be any Gentleman in this House who owes his seat to such practices, it would be infinitely better he sat here for Old Sarum; for, sitting for that borough, he would be no representative of the people: nor is he now; but, at Old Sarum, there could be no threats, no ejectments, no struggle in the breast of the elector between regard for his public duty and regard for his private interest. There, the alternative could never be put to any elector, whether he would abandon his principles, or reduce his family to misery. All tyranny is bad, but the worst is that which works with the machinery of freedom.

[Renewed cries of "Hear, hear!"]

Under an undisguised oligarchy, the people suffer only the evil of being governed by those whom they have not chosen. But in the other case, to whatever extent intimidation mixes itself up with the system of popular election, to that extent the people suffer both the evil of being governed by those whom they have not chosen, and the evil of being coerced into a professed choice. And the more wide the basis of the elective system, the worse are the mischiefs arising from it. The more human beings are converted into machines, through which some great proprietor may express his pleasure, the greater is the quantity of misery and degradation.

The Noble Lord who has seconded this motion said, and most justly too, that he did not wish to deprive wealth of its legitimate influence. Under any system, wealth must attain its legitimate influence. Wealth is power; and power, properly used, — with kindness and justice on its side, — necessarily inspires affection. Wealth — or that which is so, compared with what is possessed by the great mass of electors, — is closely connected with intellectual superiority. It enables its possessor to select and prosecute any study to which he may be inclined; to continue it when those who commence life with him under less favourable circumstances are forced to drudge for their daily bread; to enlarge his mind by foreign travel; to acquire an intimacy with the history of nations, and with the arts and sciences. These are advantages to which it is impossible that constituencies can be blind;—nay, going much below those who form the present body of electors, and descending to the very lowest of the populace, it never is found that even in their wildest aberrations they choose a leader destitute of these recommendations. This is the natural, the indestructible, the legitimate, the salutary influence of wealth.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

Whatever is more than this is corruption; and if it be thought necessary, as it appears from the speech of the Honourable Member who last spoke, that some persons in this House do think it necessary, to maintain the influence of bribery in our elective system,—then I say, that, incomparably, the best and the least objectionable method is that of open bribery. But against bribery, we have enacted laws,—against bribery, we have passed resolutions,—for bribery, boroughs are disfranchised,—for bribery, Members are unseated,—for bribery, indictments and informations are preferred,—for bribery, the penalties extend both to the elector and the elected—one man is disqualified, another man fined. On what principle do we inflict penalties on the elector?—on what principle but this,—that, from having dealt in pecuniary corruption, the elector is no longer fit to exercise the right of voting? But what is the operation of intimidation? It is this:—"Vote with me, or you give up my custom. Vote with me, or you give up your farm." Or it is thus:—"Vote with me, and I will give you 20*l.* for a pair of boots."

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches, met by cries of "Oh, oh!" from the Opposition benches.]

Why, surely, it is notorious that this is one of the constant forms of corruption. "Vote with me, and I will give you 20*l.* for a pair of boots," is a common and constant form of corruption; though less so, perhaps, because less easy, than "Vote for me, or I will carry my custom to the bootmaker's in the next street." But the truth is, that I almost dissent from the very form of expression which the Honourable Member for the city of London has made use of in his very able speech, in reference to this part of the subject. I object to making an antiphrasis between corruption and intimidation. Intimidation is corruption,—corruption stripped of everything that may seem to lend it a grace—stripped of all that conciliates—stripped of every affinity to hospitality and good humour—stripped, in short, of every colour of any kind of excuse which can be invented to recommend or adorn it; it is corruption presented in a form more loathsome, even, than its own end. It is corruption working by barbarity. Let it be considered, too, that corruption of this sort is the easiest, because it is the cheapest of all. People cannot lose by a promise; to corrupt by giving, costs something—thousands; to corrupt by threatening costs nothing but a crime. They only think superficially, who suppose that corruption is to be exercised by giving, but is not to be exercised by taking away, and by threatening. The man who practises intimidation is under no necessity of mortgaging his estate to prepare for an election; nay, at the same time that he improves, perhaps, his lands, and by the very mode of administering the economy of his family, is he able to effect, by intimidation, the purposes of corruption,—and that to a greater extent, and with more complete demoralisation, than was ever practised in Grampound or East Retford. But though intimidation be more easy than corruption to practise towards the poorer classes of men, the feelings with which those men view the relation of the two things are very different. It is much more easy and agreeable for a man to refuse that which he never had, than to submit to be pillaged of that which he is accustomed to have. Many a man who would throw away with scorn the purse of any one who came to bribe him, is now obliged to vote against his conscience and his wishes, for fear of an ejectment. And this form of corruption, be it remembered, must tell,—for it may be practised with perfect impunity. You can punish the good-natured corruption which wins men's minds under the semblance of making them happy; but you cannot reach, to punish, that ill-natured kind of corruption which makes them miserable.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

You cannot set up a tribunal which shall have a right to ask of the landed gentry throughout the country such questions as these:—"Why did you part with such a tenant? Was it because he did not pay his rent? If he did, why don't you renew his lease?" How would such a question have been brooked, at the last election for Westminster, as, "What has such and such a tailor done, that you have turned him away and taken another?"

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

Evidently such a system would be iniquitous in the extreme. Property ceases to be property, if men cannot hold it without being liable to be called upon to give a reason why they may have thought fit to discharge any one of their tradesmen. Still I feel convinced that something must be done. This is a growing evil; the number of cases we hear of become more and more frequent every election; it is an evil more subtle han any against which you direct the sharpest censures of the penal law; and yet it is not by penal laws that you can put it down, because it is so mixed up with property, that if you strike at it by a penal enactment, you inflict a blow on the rights of property at the same time. As, therefore, punishment is out of the question, and as the evil, beyond all dispute, ought to be abated, we are bound to try the means of prevention. What means, then, have been suggested? Absolutely none, except this of the Ballot. Here, then, or nowhere, we have the desired remedy; here, or nowhere, must we find the means of reconciling the rights of property with the right of suffrage. It is not only those who possess property that have "a right to do what they will with their own." The estate is the landlord's, —the vote is the tenant's. "So use your own rights," is the language of all civil as well as moral law, "as not to interfere with the rights of others." But here, it should be remarked, you cannot give the one right without infringing on, or rather destroying, the other. You cannot give the tenant that right of open voting which the tenant ought to have, without giving to the landlord what the landlord ought not to have. On the other hand, you cannot adopt any measure for rendering the right of voting, openly, inviolable and sacred, without interfering, at the same time, with the whole texture of that system of property which ought to be equally sacred. If you were to adopt such a step, you would find that you had only got an imperfect and inadequate change of the present system, at the expense of that on which is founded the national credit, wealth, prosperity, and liberty. It does, then, in my opinion, become imperative upon us to consider whether there is not found in the Ballot all that is required? whether the Ballot would not give equal and perfect protection to the voter? and whether the Ballot, and the Ballot alone, would not give to each class, all that each class ought to have, and nothing more? If this would be the effect of the Ballot— which I believe it would be, — if here, and here alone, we can find that solution of so many important political problems for which we all are desirous,—surely no slight difficulties, or apprehensions of difficulties, ought to deter us from the adoption of it. But what is the nature of the objections that are generally urged against it? The objection — though by no means the only one which has been raised — which to me appears to present the real difficulty in the way of carrying through such a measure, is the moral objection.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

Many ingenious and lively things have been said against the Ballot; but it is my belief that if, in the minds of the people, the moral objection were once disposed of, nothing could prevent their carrying on the principle of the Ballot in a single Session. As for the objection itself, much as I respect the opinions of those who urge it, I must confess that I do not think it is a sound and well-considered objection. I believe that many able and excellent persons sincerely entertain a different opinion on the matter; but I do not think that those persons have duly considered the moral evil which is the effect of the present system.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

If it be an immorality, as every one considers it to be, to tell an untruth, surely it is, at least, equally immoral so to use a public trust, which is reposed in us for the public good, as may enable us to avoid a private loss. If it be un-English for a man not to dare to own the vote that he has given, surely it is more "un-English" not to dare to vote as he thinks right. When the word "un-English" is used, I feel compelled to contrast our idea of that bold and sturdy independence which has been our great pride as a national characteristic, with the situation of a man who, holding his farm from year to year, is compelled, by fear of pecuniary loss and ruin, to poll against him whom he wishes to see chaired, and to vote for the candidate whom, with all his heart, he would see well ducked. At present, we know that many dishonest votes are given; but let a system of secrecy in voting be introduced, and we should have honest votes, although the parties might afterwards deny that they had given them. Which is the greater evil of the two? God forbid that I should say anything which should seem to extenuate the guilt of falsehood! but God forbid, also, that I should not make some allowance for the poor as well as for the rich! God forbid that I should see more distinctly the mote in the eye of the 10*l.* householder, than the beam in the eye of a baronet or a bishop!

If our morality be anything more than capricious favour or mere pretext, we shall have ample opportunities of exercising it, without waiting till the Ballot becomes the law of the land, or without even descending below our own rank in life. If it be criminal in a man to utter an untruth for the purpose of guarding a secret against private curiosity, then I say that we may find many criminals of a far higher station, and of a far more cultivated intellect, than the butchers and bakers, about whose veracity we are now so anxious. I will take a single illustration from the case of anonymous writers. It is perfectly notorious that men of high consideration, men of the first distinction, have written books, and published them without their names, and on being questioned on the point, have denied that they were the authors of the works they had written; and yet this denial does not prevent them from being generally considered with respect and kindness in society. We have also seen casuists of great repute defend those parties. One illustrious name I will instance, which will, no doubt, suggest itself to all who hear me, — the name of a man of first-rate genius, of excellent principles, and a noble spirit, — I need hardly add the name of Sir Walter Scott. Sir Walter Scott published, without his name, that eminent and popular series of novels which has endeared him to all his countrymen, — nay, almost to all the world, — and which I, for one, cannot think upon without feelings of the deepest admiration and gratitude. Sir Walter Scott published that series of novels anonymously, and, to all questions put to him on the subject, persisted in denying the authorship of them, till at length he consented to drop the veil of concealment, and acknowledged them to be the productions of his pen. Now, I ask — and I appeal to many who were personally acquainted with that great man — I would ask, did this concealment and subsequent avowal of his name reflect any shame on the character of Sir Walter Scott? Did any one of the large and splendid circle of his friends and admirers consider that Sir Walter Scott had dishonoured himself by this proceeding? All that I demand is this; — that in our moral dealings we should consult the feelings and impressions of other classes, as well as that to which we have the happiness to belong, — that we should weigh with one weight, and deal with one measure, to all alike, — that we should afford the same protection to the feelings of the poor man from the tyrannical interference of his superiors, as we allow a gentleman to use to protect himself from the curiosity of other men. If I were asked by a secret voter what he should say, if questioned on the subject of his vote, I should advise him to tell the truth and take the consequences, just as I now should advise him to give his vote according to his conscience, under the existing forms, and take the consequence. We have no right to expect sacrifices and moral courage of this kind from everybody; but I believe there are still a great number of "village Hampdens," who give their votes openly, do avow them, and take the consequences, despite the unjustifiable and inquisitorial interference of their richer neighbours. On the other hand, it is those who, under existing circumstances, give dishonest votes, who, under the Ballot, would venture upon a denial of their votes; and of the two alternatives — of the two chances of evil — I think the latter is to be preferred. In short, if the voters cannot at once keep faith with their country, and with their corrupters, I am one who wish that we should have a system by which their faith may be preserved to their country, and broken to their corrupters.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

The subject, Sir, in short, resolves itself into this simple question, — whether the great settlement of the elective system achieved by the Reform Bill is, indeed to be final?

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

Digitized by Google

Upon this question I have always understood, with the Honourable Member for London, that the Ballot was a reserved question; and I never conceived that any person, by supporting the Reform Bill, was thereby compromised on the subject of the Ballot. Now, with regard to that much discussed point, the finality of the Reform Bill, I know my own sentiments, and those I will express. I have always regarded that great measure with reverence — but with a rational, not a superstitious reverence. On all the principles on which I supported that measure, I conceive that I am bound, on good cause being shown, to amend it. But the question, whether it ought to be amended, or not, is one which, in my mind, should be discussed and decided on no other principle than that of the public good. And in this view of the case, I do say that there appear to me to be strong arguments against frequent and violent changes in our constitutional system. The revolution of 1832, — for revolution it was, and a most fearful and sanguinary revolution it would have been in any other nation than this, or at any other period, — that revolution was effected without civil disorder, and without the effusion of blood; but, unquestionably, the passing of the Bill was attended with much excitement and danger.

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

That excitement and that danger I am not desirous to renew. I would bear with many inconveniences rather than open a similar scene; nay, I would bear with many grievances rather than expose the country to the risks, the excitements which must accompany a complete reconstruction of our whole representative system. But, Sir, if we wish the Reform Bill to be a final measure, we must see that it be real and effectual, — that it shall not be, either wholly or in part, a delusion; we must take care that we do not destroy abuses in one form, merely to see them start up again in forms still more odious, — that we do not create franchises, and then suffer them to be converted into a species of villain service, baser and more degrading to moral feeling than anything which existed in the fourteenth century by virtue of the most arbitrary and tyrannical law of that dark period in our history. Sir, it was not for this, that, in the year 1831, the whole country rose up as one man, — that threats and petty interference were disregarded, bribes rejected, corruption manfully resisted and overborne; — it was not for this result, that the church, the peerage, and the court, on that memorable occasion, yielded submission to the irresistible array of a determined and united people.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

The object of that mighty movement was not to arrest and pluck up abuses, merely to allow them to renew their growth, and flourish again under new forms and denominations; — it was not to disfranchise Old Sarum in order to establish a new and a worse Old Sarum, under another name, in its stead; to disqualify Gatton in order to raise up the corrupt influence of many Gattons in our counties and sub-divisions of counties.

Sir, I am convinced that the time is not far remote when this great nation, with a voice as imperial as that with which she demanded the Reform Bill, will demand that the Reform Bill be practically carried out in its noblest principles, and be made a truth. And when that just demand shall be conceded, as it surely will be, — when the franchise of every elector shall be a franchise indeed, — I am firmly convinced that the achievement of this national object, instead of preparing the way for reckless change, spoliation, and commotion, will strengthen the law, secure the just rights of property, draw closer together the legitimate ties between one order in society and another, and cement the affections of all parties in the state to the law, the Parliament, and the throne.

Mr. MILNES. — I have listened with much attention to the Honourable and Learned Gentleman's ingenious defence of the Government, in making the question of the Ballot an open question.

I am anxious to address the House on the subject in debate, as this is, perhaps, the only opportunity I or any other Honourable Member will have of approaching it, before it may please her Majesty's Government to hasten an event which will send us all to our homes.

We all lament the existence of many of the evils which have been pointed out by the Honourable and Learned Member for Edinburgh, in a speech to which, though it did not carry conviction to my mind, yet I, in common with every Honourable Member, have listened with that delight which his eloquence always commands. Notwithstanding all that has been said in its favour, I cannot divest my mind of the idea that the Ballot is un-English, not merely according to the definition which has been given by Honourable Members opposite, but as it is inconsistent with our English customs and habits, both political and social, and, I may add, constitutional; and I am persuaded it never will prove a remedy for the evils complained of. If I know anything of the feelings of the people of England, I am sure they will never consent to secret voting being made compulsory. You never can prevent the high-spirited independent voter from declaring whom he has supported with his vote; and, if so, the effect would be, that those who maintained silence would be considered as having voted against a candidate who had endeavoured to influence them. The Honourable Member for London says, "You acknowledge the evil; then, at all events, let us make the experiment of the remedy." But I know of no such thing as an experiment in political philosophy; — once make a false step in political science, and that step cannot be retraced. The Ballot, if adopted, would totally and entirely fail in accomplishing its purpose, — it would deceive the hopes of the people, as the Reform Bill has deceived them, — it would not lead to those consequences which they expect to realize through its medium; and, in a few short years, we should hear the same outcry "to carry out the spirit" of the ballot-box as we now hear "to carry out the spirit" of the Reform Bill. Thus we should go on from disease to remedy, and remedy to disease, till all that has hitherto been stable in our institutions was destroyed, — and unmitigated discontent, which is, at once, the child and the parent of change, prevailed throughout the country. Let us rather trust to the force of public opinion, and its growing power. Before the democratic power of England, if roused by oppression, oppression cannot stand; and if the aristocracy of England abuse those powers and that influence, for evil, which are given them for good, a most fearful vengeance will fall on their heads.

[Loud cries of "Divide, divide!"]

LORD JOHN RUSSELL and SIR G. STAUNTON rose together.

[Loud cries for "Lord John Russell!"]

SIR G. STAUNTON. — Having, Sir, given a notice ——

[Renewed and continued calls for "Lord John Russell!"]

In the present temper of the House, I will not press the motion for the moderate and middle course of which I have given notice. The amendment I had intended to move was, to try the Ballot in the first ten counties, cities, or boroughs, of which one half of the registered electors should petition for the same. But, as the House does not seem inclined to adopt any medium, I shall think it > —— better to bear the ills we know,

> Than fly to others that we know not of.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — In rising to address the House on this subject, I feel I have no such excuse as that given by my Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Edinburgh (whose able and eloquent speech stands in need of no comment, other than its ability and eloquence, to recommend it), — I feel I have no such excuse as he made, when he said that he had not been used for some time to address this House on any subject, — in now asking the attention of the House for some few minutes; for, Sir, I know — I am perfectly aware — that there is nothing I can at present address to the House that has not been addressed to it frequently before; and the arguments I, myself, have used on former occasions, I shall be obliged to repeat, — meaning, as I do, to conclude, as I have always done, by declaring my intention to vote against the motion of my Honourable Friend the Member for London. Sir, I own I could have wished that my Honourable and Learned Friend the Member for Edinburgh had taken a longer time to pause on this important question, before he finally decided on sanctioning this change with regard to the practice of our elections. I could have wished that he had longer trusted to what he said, when Member for Leeds, he thought would, in time, prove efficacious, — namely, "the growing and predominant influence of public opinion," — before he finally determined to give the sanction of his vote, and, what is more, the weight of his ability and argument, in favour of this change. Sir, I was the more induced to regret his decision, when I saw how little disposed he was to weigh, duly, what I think some of the strongest objections to this measure. My Honourable and Learned Friend has said that no slight objections ought to stand in the way of the adoption of the Ballot. But did those objections, which he himself has admitted, seem to the House of so very slight and inconsiderable a nature? Why, Sir, one of those effects he acknowledges will be, to do away with the influence of public opinion.

I own I should not have expected from my Honourable and Learned Friend, knowing what weight he attaches to public opinion, — what influence, no doubt, he attributes to it, and would gladly see it produce in all our institutions, and in all our public transactions, — that in this act alone, and that a most important one, by which the representatives of the people are chosen, he should be content to have public opinion forego its influence, and that he should consider this one of the slight objections which may be urged against the Ballot. Sir, I have always considered — (I am obliged, as I said, to recur to my former objections)—that it was an evil which should make us pause and feel a repugnancy to this change, — that we were thereby putting the electors of the United Kingdom in a totally different position from that of every other individual, of every body, and of every authority, even the highest amongst us. The judges of the land, in pronouncing their judgments, — the Houses of Parliament, in their proceedings and debates, — even the conduct of the Sovereign, as we have on a late occasion seen, on one of these rare opportunities when an exercise of authority is called for, apart from the advice of responsible Ministers of the Crown, — even the conduct of the Sovereign, I say, has been made the subject of political discussion, has been openly canvassed, and exposed to the influence of respectful, yet free, public opinion. And by that public opinion, or by the results of that public opinion, every one of us — the judges of the land, the Houses of Parliament, the Sovereign herself — is content, and will be content, to abide. And yet, now, Sir, we are to be told that there is to be one class of persons, not comprehending the whole nation, but a chosen class, amounting, as the Honourable Member for Middlesex said on a former night, to some fraction of the adult male population, — to one fifth or one seventh, — that these persons are to be totally free and exempt from all the influence of public opinion, and, in choosing their representatives, uncontrolled by any responsibility,—whether under the influence of the hatred of a person whom they pretend to love, — whether under the influence of malice against a person whom they pretend to respect, — whether under the influence of corruption, with the pretence of purity, — under whatever influence they may act, however bad, however anxious, however incapable of being avowed, — under such an influence and such a motive these electors will shield and shroud their conduct in the solemn act of selecting their representatives.

[Loud and continued cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

I do hope, then, Sir, that my Honourable and Learned Friend, although he may not change his opinion on the Ballot, will yet consider that in adopting it he is foregoing a very great public advantage; and that if he do feel himself driven to this necessity, he will also feel that no slight or small objections stand in the way of him who assumes the responsibility of adopting a change which is incompatible with the practice of the constitution, and may be found inconsistent with the future welfare of the people. I must ask, when it is proposed to me to adopt the Ballot, in the first place, whether it will be a specific for the particular evils of which you complain? and, in the second place, whether, supposing it may prove such a specific, and that those evils prevail to a great extent, it will not induce other evils, unknown under the present system? Now, with regard to that first question, I have heard much from my Honourable and Learned Friend, most eloquently expressed, about intimidation and corruption. I have heard much, too, from the Honourable Member for the city of London, with respect to the evils of intimidation. I allow the truth of every word which has fallen from both of them, on this subject. I allow that the evils of intimidation are great; although I certainly modify that opinion so far as not to agree with them that these evils are not, probably, carried to the very great extent which they assert. But allowing that this intimidation is a very great evil, and that we ought to endeavour to remedy it, I think my Honourable and Learned Friend, and the Honourable Member for London, though they arrive at that point, fall far short of proving that the Ballot is what we require. I have heard nothing, either from the mover or seconder of the motion, which shows that the proposition of the Ballot will remove the evil of which they complain. Now, take the instance referred to by my Noble Friend the seconder of the motion. A tenant is called on by the steward of his landlord to say whether or not he has voted in favour of a particular candidate. I do not believe that, for a long time at least, the Ballot will prevent that intimidation. I do not believe that the farmers and yeomen of England will practise that dissimulation which has been suggested, however wise it may be, or however it may receive the palliation, though not the justification, of my Noble Friend. I do not believe that they would be able to practise that dissimulation which would be necessary to enable them to conceal their votes. I believe that a very few months would decide the question, and that something like this would take place: — the steward would call on John Smith, and say, "Well, John, you went and voted at the last election?" — "I did." "For whom did you vote?" No answer. "Now, tell me, frankly and fairly, did you not vote for the Whig candidate?" I venture to say that John Smith would reply, "I tell you, frankly and fairly, that I did vote for the Whig candidate."

Digitized by Google

[Loud cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

As matters are constituted at present, however you may tell him that he would be justified in saying that he voted for the Tory, when he actually voted for the Whig, — however you may endeavour to prove to him, by all kinds of refined and specious arguments, that this pretext was a fair one, which he was entitled to use, — I think his plain, honest nature would prompt him to own what he had done. Well, then, if the landlord be determined to put in practice the "crime," as my Honourable and Learned Friend truly calls it, of intimidation, and it follows, as the consequence of this confession of the farmer, — how do you expect it will operate? If these instances of persecution continue to occur, they may operate in such a way, at last, as to induce the voter no longer to obey the plain dictates of his honest nature, — no longer to avow frankly his politics, as he has hitherto done, — no longer to admit the fact that he has voted as he really has done; — but he will gain something of that habit of deception which we are told he ought to assume. Then, Sir, we have to consider whether, when we have in some degree cured the political evils of intimidation, we shall not have introduced the social and moral evil of deception, of loss of truth, and loss of character? a change for which I, for one, am not prepared.

Now, Sir, it may be said, and it has been said, that although it is wrong that a person should declare that he has voted for one whom he has not voted for, there is a falsehood in the present manner in which he gives his vote; and that, in fact, by the Ballot, we are only telling one falsehood instead of another. This answer only shows how very much at a loss the advocates of the Ballot are to answer the objection that it would introduce want of truth into our election proceedings. I own that it is a very degrading thing for a man who has a vote — who has that high trust confided to him — to go to the hustings, and say, as he does, in some cases, say, "I have voted for Mr. So and So; but, I must own, I would much rather have voted the other way." That is a very degrading position. At the same time, I cannot say that it is exactly the same position as that which a man is placed in, who states, after the election, that he voted for the person for whom he did not vote; though one is a political offence, — a degradation and a betrayal of the trust reposed in him, — it does not cast the same reproach on his moral character as the other false assurance must necessarily entail. Then, with respect to bribery, all my Honourable and Learned Friend can say, as other less able and less candid advocates have admitted, is, that it would not greatly aggravate bribery. So that, when you have got your machinery perfect, — when you have sent the ballot-box (which my Learned Friend also doubts the expediency of adopting) down into every county, city, and borough in the kingdom, — your intimidation, as it appears to me, does not cease; and the only consolation you can give is, that bribery will not thereby be greatly aggravated. Well, Sir, if this be not a specific — as I believe it not to be — for the existing evils, let me consider whether, besides those I have already mentioned, there will not be new evils attendant on the change? I have often said — and nothing that I have heard has convinced me that that opinion is erroneous — that the Ballot would very much increase the dissatisfaction of those who have no votes. After all, it seems to me a very fair constitution of the electoral franchise, that a certain number should be judged worthy, by property, by position, by their station in the counties and towns which they inhabit, to enjoy the elective franchise; and that those who have not the franchise should, at least, have the privilege of being spectators of the election, — should have the power of canvassing the merits of the different candidates with the voters, and the merits of the voters, themselves, in the exercise of their franchise. This seems to be both reasonable and consistent with the constitution. But when you say that one set of persons are to have the power, without any responsibility, without the incident of their votes being known except by the general result, exclusively to return Members to this House,—I do think that not only those who are now seeking for universal suffrage, but also the more moderate of the working and unrepresented classes, would feel very great and general dissatisfaction. There are, doubtless, those who think this no evil, because it would compel us to carry out these changes still further, by what the Honourable Member for London calls an extension of the franchise, and a more equitable distribution of the suffrage. I am not now going into the consideration of the question whether he is right, or not. To those who support the Ballot, thinking that it would and should be followed by a larger extension of the suffrage, I do not now address myself; but there are many —and the Honourable Member has sought for their votes — who are inclined to adopt any remedy that promises to put an end to the evils complained of, but are satisfied with the general distribution of the suffrage as it now stands, and who do not wish that any change which may take place in the mode of voting shall be followed by a great extension of the suffrage. I put it to them, whether the state of things which is likely to take place, if the Ballot were once admitted, would not be one that would render it very difficult to resist those demands? For my part, I think, if the Ballot should be made effectual in point of secrecy, that the discontent which would prevail would soon be such that you would be obliged to return to the open mode of voting.

But I am asked, as every one is asked in a case of this kind, how is it, if you admit the evil and reject the Ballot, that you are not prepared with some other remedy? I might give other answers to this question; but I will give the one which appears to suggest itself from the present state of the country in respect to the franchise. You have had, for a long time, a free representative constitution. You had, formerly, a great number of the Members of this House named, without any real election by persons having the right of suffrage. During that time, however, there were many persons elected by very large constituencies. From the beginning till the end of the last century, the general opinion was, on the part of the owners of property, and the tenants dependent on them, that they ought to go together; the tenant went with the landlord, and voted for the candidate whom his landlord favoured, without troubling himself much with political affairs. By the Reform Bill you have extended the power of voting to thousands who never enjoyed it before; and with it there has arisen a much greater degree of knowledge, of independent feeling, as I think, — and, more especially, there has arisen a much greater degree of interest in political affairs. The spread of political information has only increased their desire for more knowledge. On the other hand are the powers of property; — powers — exercised by some, fairly; by many, indifferently well; by others, very tyrannically. Here is an immediate collision between the two classes: the great number of electors exercising their franchise freely, and not wishing to employ it merely in accordance with the desire of their landlords; — the landlords, on the other hand, desiring to exert their power, as in former times, and to compel their tenantry to vote in the same manner as themselves. We are now living in the time of this collision and irritation. You say that, for this evil, the only remedy is the Ballot. I have already acquainted the House with my objections to that remedy, and that I, for one, will not consent to its adoption; — but my opinion is, that if you do not adopt that remedy, you will come — before any very long period has elapsed — to a better state of things, in which these powers of property will be exercised with a greater regard to the rights of the electors — when the landlord will not pretend to say, "Here is a man with a vote; he is a tenant of mine; therefore his vote belongs to me, and I have a right to control the exercise of it." I think that the free and independent feeling of the people of the United Kingdom is strong enough to carry this change into effect without the interposition of the Ballot. I believe in their virtue; — I trust in their public spirit; — I rely upon their intelligence. I believe that you will diminish all the evils now complained of without the aid of the Ballot; and therefore it is that, in this time of crises, — great as the complaints are, — I think it is far better to let this matter work itself out, rather than adopt so dangerous an expedient as that suggested by the Honourable Member for London (Mr. Grote). After what my Honourable and Learned Friend (Mr. Macaulay) has said, — and, for his manner of discussing this subject, I must give him my thanks, as I have done upon many former occasions, — after what he has said with respect to open questions, I do not mean to enter into any defence of the course which the Government has taken in making this what is called an open question. If that course be, on our part, a fault, my Honourable and Learned Friend has shown that it has been a fault of former Governments. I took occasion, in the discussion upon the subject of the corn laws, to show that, over and over again, it had been the practice of the Governments of this country, — and of some of the strongest Governments of the country, — who, being united as to matters connected with the conduct of the public affairs, were yet divided on many matters of great and important interest to the country, and upon which public opinion was much divided, — to allow those matters to be discussed as open questions. When this question came on for discussion last year, I fairly and freely confess that I exerted all my influence, not only with the members of the Government with whom I was associated, but with many others with whom I was connected by the ties of friendship, to induce them not to vote in favour of the Ballot. The only consequence was, that we had a division, in which two hundred Members — forming the greater part of those who sit on this side of the House — voted in favour of the proposition of the Honourable Member for London (Mr. Grote). I do not think that, in consequence of the opinion so expressed by so large a number of Members sitting on this side of the House, I am, in the least, obliged to abandon my opinion, or to vote otherwise than I did upon that occasion; but, at the same time, I must observe, that if I had continued to press my opinions upon my Friends in the same manner as heretofore, I think I should be acting most unjustly to those with whom I have been long acting in political affairs — whose opinions I respect, and whose conduct I deeply esteem.

Mr. SHEIL. — I believe it is the universal sense of the House that there ought to be a division upon the question this night. I shall obey the wish of the House, and be as brief as possible. My observations will be very short indeed. I rise solely for the purpose of adverting to what I consider to be important facts — facts upon which I shall scarcely make a comment. In the year 1833, at a dinner given at Gateshead, the Earl of Durham made an important disclosure —— a disclosure in which many members of the Government and several Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House were concerned.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

The Earl of Durham upon that occasion said that it had been referred to him — to him, the Earl of Durham, — to Lord Duncannon; to the Noble Lord (Lord John Russell), now the Member for Stroud, but then the Member for Devonshire, — and to the Right Honourable Baronet (Sir James Graham), at that time the Member for Cumberland, but now the Member for Pembroke, — to arrange the programme of a Reform Bill. It was not stated by Lord Durham, at that time, what took place at that important conclave of intrepid innovators.

[Cheers and laughter.]

A year afterwards, a dinner took place at Edinburgh, at which Lord Grey, Lord Durham, and Lord Brougham were present. Upon that occasion references were made — obscure, but quite sufficient to excite further curiosity — as to what took place on the important occasion to which I have previously referred. An article appeared in the Edinburgh Review, in 1834 — the writer of which it was less difficult to detect than the giver of a vote dropped into the ballot-box.

[Cheers and laughter.]

In consequence of this article, Lord Durham wrote a letter, in the month of October, 1834, to the distinguished editor of the Edinburgh Review. The matter rested there. The late King died; and a dinner took place at Stroud in July, 1837. Upon that occasion a speech was made by the Noble Lord (Lord John Russell). I have in my hand a copy of that speech, corrected by the Noble Lord, from which

I beg to be permitted to read one passage. It is very short; but it is most important. The Noble Lord said, —

I am not about to address you with respect to the vote by ballot, and the duration of Parliaments,—having declared my opinions upon those subjects the other day. I will only repeat, now, that when I was a member of the committee which framed the great outlines of the Reform Bill, I was selected to propose a plan of which the chief heads were adopted by the committee. That plan began by proposing the total disfranchisement of fifty small boroughs, and the partial disfranchisement of fifty more; it then went on to propose the enfranchisement of all the great manufacturing towns. The plan originally contained no proposition with respect either to the Ballot or the duration of Parliaments; but in the course of the discussions which took place in the committee, proposals were made upon those subjects, which, after some consideration, were adopted; and in the plan which I ultimately submitted to Lord Grey's Cabinet, I suggested that the vote by ballot should be adopted, and that the duration of Parliament should be five years. I am mentioning this fact, because I know that several statements have been made upon this subject; and at the time that these statements were made, I had the permission of his late Majesty to state any facts upon this subject which I thought necessary in the way of explanation. I have done so. I should, however, state that at the same time that the Ballot was proposed by the committee, it was suggested that the franchise should be raised to 20*l*. But the decision of Lord Grey's Government, upon the whole, was not to propose anything to the Legislature with respect to the duration of Parliament and the Ballot, and ultimately the qualification for the franchise was fixed at 10*l*.

I will not venture to ask the question whether the programme, signed by the names of every one of the members of the committee, with the exception of Lord Duncannon, was forthcoming; but I do suggest this to those who have since changed their minds upon the Ballot: — Are not the arguments upon the moral part of the case stronger, now, than they were then? In what respect is the question changed in a moral sense? — for it is upon the moral part of the case that the Noble Lord (Lord John Russell), exclusively, or, at all events, most strenuously, relies.

I have said that I will rely upon facts: I will redeem my pledge: I will not be led into argument. When the Reform Bill was brought into the House of Commons, it was stated by the Noble Lord that the question of the Ballot was reserved. The Honourable Member for Kilkenny (Mr. Hume) immediately got up in his place and said, "I am glad that that question is reserved — I am glad that it is postponed till we see how the Reform Bill works." Mr. Calcraft, upon the same occasion, said, "How can the Noble Lord call this a final measure, when the Ballot, a matter of paramount importance, is distinctly reserved?" And when the Marquess of Chandos brought in his clause, what took place? Lord Althorp objected to it. Upon what ground? Why, that it would inevitably lead to the Ballot. The Commons, however, adopted that clause; and when Lord Grey brought the Bill into the House of Lords, he said, —

The Bill does not now stand in the shape in which it was originally proposed; it has, in several respects, been mutilated and impaired by its opponents;

And then, particularly referring to the 50*l*. tenant at will clause, he added, —

This last regulation is one which I should not have proposed, myself. It has been projected and carried by persons not connected with the Government, and the Government are not answerable for it. I hope it will be found to act well; but, then, it is liable to this objection — that, if the same influence be exercised over tenants in counties that has been exercised in other places, which it is not necessary for me now to name, it will be likely to generate a very strong feeling in favour of a regulation to which I am, myself, opposed, — I mean the adoption of the vote by ballot.

Did any man at that time say a word about the finality of the Reform Bill? Was a word said, on either side of the House, upon the point?

[Cries of "Yes!" from several Members on the Opposition benches.]

Ay, there was; but it was not stated that the Reform Bill was final upon the subject of the Ballot.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!"]

No! the reverse was stated — the very reverse was asserted by friend and foe. By whom was it asserted? By the Noble Lord (Lord John Russell) the Member for Stroud, by Lord Grey, by Mr. Calcraft, by Lord Wharncliffe. I hope the House will permit me to read five sentences from the speech of Lord Wharncliffe, upon the second reading of the Reform Bill in the House of Lords. Lord Wharncliffe said, —

He was ready to admit that the increase to the county constituency on this last head (the tenant at will) did not proceed from his Majesty's Ministers, but that it was imposed upon them by a Noble Lord, a friend of his, in another place. In his opinion, the addition to the county constituency from this source was anything but an improvement. Primâ facie, it gave an appearance of weight to the landed proprietary; but the working of the clause would be this, — that if any landlord ever exercised the power given to him by it, he would be placed in the same disagreeable and obnoxious situation in which many high-minded individuals who wished to get rid of refractory tenants were placed under the present system. This clause, connected with the 10*l.* qualification clause, would place a great number of the new-made voters entirely at the mercy of their landlords; but their Lordships would deceive themselves egregiously if they imagined that the exercise of such a power on the part of the landlords would not lead almost instantly to the vote by ballot. If you make every election throughout the country a popular election, the only way in which a quiet man, unused to public speaking and to the crowding and jostling and sarcasm of the hustings, can be protected, will be by means of the Ballot; and that mode of election would certainly end in the introduction of the vote by ballot. Then came another ground put forth by the Government; he meant that this Bill would be a final settlement of the Reform question. It was impossible that it should be so. He had already warned their Lordships on this subject. He had warned them that the persons who were now most clamorous for reform had plainly declared to the country that they would not stop here. All of their Lordships who had read the public journals lately, would want no other proof to convince them of the correctness of that assertion. In the other House of Parliament the matter had been clearly given up, for there the Noble Lord who had introduced the Bill had fairly admitted that the Bill could not be final. That Noble Lord had said that the question now was, "Will the people be satisfied with the Bill?" for, if they were not, Parliament must needs go further. He (Lord Wharncliffe) fully agreed in that opinion. Ministers had already opened a door to the demands of the people; they had told the people that they were entitled to a full, fair, and free representation in Parliament, and the people would insist on having that representation in perfect conformity with the ideas which they entertained of a full, fair, and free representation.

Let no man, after hearing this citation, which is now a portion of history (and to which every one has access), say that the Reform Bill, upon the subject of the Ballot, is final and conclusive. Are not the evils of the existing system admitted on both sides of the House? The Noble Lord the Member for Stroud has talked, — I will not say lightly, — but has this night talked of intimidation, as if it did not exist to an extent at all to warrant the eloquent expatiations of the Honourable and Learned Member for Edinburgh; but does the Noble Lord remember that, in 1835, when the Honourable Member for London brought forward the question of the Ballot, he (Lord J. Russell) stated that the then recent election had been carried against him, in Devonshire, by intimidation; and that some of the members, who had formerly acted upon his committee, had been compelled, as they assured him, to vote against him? And did not the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth, himself, upon the same occasion, admit that, under the existing system, a great deal of intimidation was constantly practised, — "a practice," added he, "which I detest." Is it even so? Did the Right Honourable Baronet say that he detested the practice? Then, no doubt, the practice existed; for it is well known that the Right Honourable Baronet is not wont to waste factitious detestations upon fictitious grievances. I do not say this in mockery of the Right Honourable Baronet. I believe that the Right Honourable Baronet's detestation of intimidation is sincere. But when the evil is admitted on all hands, — by the chief members of the Government, and the chief opponents of the Government, — I wish to see something done. What does the Noble Lord (Lord J. Russell) propose? What does the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Tamworth propose? If I may pardoned for resorting to so homely a mode of expression, I think that the position of both these important personages, with reference to this question, may be aptly enough described according to the jest common amongst my humbler and poorer countrymen, — "What are you doing, Lord John?" — "Nothing," says he. "What are you doing, Sir Robert?" — "Oh! I am helping Lord John." This is a state of things which cannot continue.

SIR J. GRAHAM. — Sir, I should not have risen at this hour, and especially after the speech of the Noble Lord, to take a share in this discussion, if it had not been for some observations which have fallen from the Honourable and Learned Gentleman who has just sat down. As to the general merits of the question, I propose to rest the vote I shall give to-night on the general arguments which have been adduced by the Noble Lord and by the Honourable and Learned Member for Edinburgh. But the Honourable and Learned Gentleman (Mr. Sheil) has referred to some facts, — he terms them historical, — which he thinks change the complexion of the case; and I shall frankly state to the House what, I trust, will be a sufficient answer to what has fallen from the Honourable and Learned Gentleman. I am far from denying the share that was allotted to me in the original draught of the measure to be submitted to the Cabinet of his late Majesty, with whom rested the preparation of the Reform Bill. I do not deny that I was associated in that charge with the Noble Lord opposite (Lord J. Russell), Lord Durham, and Lord Duncannon. The Noble Lord, it would appear, from the passage cited from his speech by the Honourable and Learned Member, received from his late Majesty a permission to make such statements on the subject as he might think necessary for his own defence. The Noble Lord exercised that power and discretion in the passage cited by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, in a manner of which I cannot complain. But I must observe, in passing, that these disclosures of what takes place amongst colleagues under the seal of secrecy, do not appear calculated to contribute to that implicit confidence which ought to prevail among members of the same Government, and cannot certainly promote a freedom of discussion among confidential servants of the Crown. I do not doubt that the Noble Lord thought the necessity of the case in this instance justified such a proceeding, although it was made on the hustings at a general election. I must observe, that, on this subject of the Ballot, the Noble Lord was not very explicit as to what his opinions were, and he was returned: but I see a Gentleman behind the Noble Lord who can bear witness that I, at the election for Cumberland, was perfectly explicit; — I said that nothing whatever should induce me to support the Ballot, and I lost my election. But with regard to these disclosures. I did not receive the permission of his late Majesty to make any disclosure on the subject of the original plan of the Reform Bill submitted to the Cabinet; I, therefore, can explain nothing — I can admit nothing — I can deny nothing.

The Honourable Member for the city of London and I are politically opposed; but I appeal to him whether I was not bound by my oath as a Privy Councillor? I appeal to every Gentleman in the House whether I can consider myself at liberty to disclose what took place under that seal of secrecy? If the Noble Lord think proper (having permission), he may carry his disclosures yet further. I should not object to his stating at whose suggestion the Ballot was inserted in the draught; still less should I object to his stating by whose votes the Ballot was rejected. We well know that at that time there was, in the Cabinet, a keeper of the King's conscience, whose boast it was that he had an argument which amounted to a mathematical demonstration that the Ballot was impracticable. But, whatever may be said by the Noble Lord as to the introduction of the Bill, I deny that, during the progress of the discussion on the Bill, the Members of Lord Grey's Cabinet, as far as they themselves were concerned, ever understood that it was open to them to support the Ballot, or a further extension of the franchise; and I have the strongest possible reason for saying so. I suppose it will not be denied that Lord Althorp spoke the sentiments of the Government of which he was a member? Well, what did Lord Althorp say in reference to this subject of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman's introduction? He said that, during the progress of the Reform Bill, negotiations were set on foot, with many persons opposed to the measure, who, in consequence of certain promises which were made to them in respect of its finality, were persuaded to support it. Now, who will say which of these reluctant persons who gave their sanction to the 10*l.* franchise, on condition that the Reform Bill should go no further, — who will say that their hopes shall be disappointed, and the promise that has been made to them — broken?

The Honourable and Learned Member for Edinburgh has said that which I am not disposed to deny, — that with regard to a Legislature — and the laws of a people — there must always be changes carrying on. I admit that, in the progress of events, with regard to a great nation, finality does not, and cannot, exist. But, with regard to individuals, I do contend that, in considering their obligations, — not implied ones, but those of men who solemnly pledge themselves, as members of a Cabinet, to support or oppose certain measures, — I say that, in their case, finality does exist; and though the doctrine of finality may not be binding on any other man in the realm, — still I say, that as to the Noble Lord's colleagues in Lord Grey's Cabinet, the pledge of finality, as to the Reform Bill, is binding on them — one and all. It is well known that many Members gave their support to the Reform Bill on the express understanding, that it was to be a permanent and final measure, and that Lord Althorp and his colleagues would, from that time, abandon their support of the Ballot. Those persons would be all cruelly deceived, if the members of Earl Grey's Cabinet, who so induced them to support the Reform Bill, were now to turn round and become the supporters of further change. It was a general and uniform belief that the Reform Bill was to be a final measure; and that Lord Grey, who had been one of the friends of the people, and a supporter of triennial Parliaments, so considered it; — and that he accepted and offered it in full and complete satisfaction of all the claims of the people.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

Can there be a question that Lord Althorp gave a pledge that the Reform Bill should be final?

Mr. SHEIL. — No, no!

SIR JAMES GRAHAM. — The Honourable and Learned Gentleman seems to doubt. I will refer him to a passage from his Lordship's speech.

Mr. WARBURTON. — Hear, hear!

SIR J. GRAHAM. — The Honourable Member for Bridport cheers. I will read the passage, and then ask that Honourable Member whether Lord Althorp did not, in language as strong as human tongue could express, pledge the Cabinet of Lord Grey to the finality of the Reform Bill? The Honourable and Learned Gentleman has cited a passage from Lord Althorp's speech in 1832.

Mr. SHEIL. — No, — in 1831.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM. — Very well; in 1831. I will, now, read a part of a speech of Lord Althorp's in 1833. It was spoken in answer to the motion of the Honourable Member for the city of London, during the debate on his first motion for the Ballot, the year after the passing of the Reform Bill. Lord Althorp, on that occasion, thus expressed himself: —

It was stated by the Honourable mover of this motion, that when my Noble Friend first introduced the Reform Bill into this House he said that this question was not immediately connected with the measure he was introducing, — that it need not then be discussed, for that his was not a final measure. Now, I appeal to every Gentleman who was a Member of the late Parliament, and to every person who watched the proceedings of the House pending the discussion of the Reform Bill, to say whether the promoters of that measure did not constantly state that, as far as the representation of the people was concerned, they considered it a final measure?

Now, here is the origin of the very expression. It may be said that there is a difference between the representation of the people and the vote by ballot. But what was the application of Lord Althorp of the pledge? He applied it to the motion of the Honourable Member for London.

For my own part, I have frequently stated that it was a final measure. It may be said that the vote I shall give to-night will be inconsistent with my former vote on the same subject.

Lord Althorp conceived that he might be attacked in giving his vote on that occasion against the motion of the Honourable Member for London, because, in 1830, Lord Althorp had supported the Ballot. Now, I never, in the whole course of my life, voted for the Ballot; nor ever advocated the Ballot. I have constantly refused my assent to it; I have risked several elections by openly stating my objections to it; and, last of all, I lost my seat for Cumberland by my opposition to the Ballot. But Lord Althorp was differently situated, and therefore Lord Althorp felt the inconvenience which might result if he should afterwards vote inconsistently: now Lord Althorp remarked: —

It may be said that the vote I shall give to-night will be inconsistent with my former vote on the same subject; but if I were to vote with the Honourable Member opposite (the Honourable Member for London), I should act most inconsistently with the professions I made during the progress of the measure of Reform.

At the close of his speech, his Lordship added, —

I feel that I shall render myself liable to attack for the vote I shall give; but so I should, were I to vote the other way; and, what is worse, I should feel that I had been acting a part I could not reconcile to my ideas of right.*

And his Lordship declared to me that he did not consider himself at liberty to vote for the Ballot, whatever his individual opinions might be, shackled as he was by pledges to his colleagues for the finality of the Reform Bill. I have now quoted doctrines fully as express and authentic as those which have been adduced by the Honourable and Learned Gentleman. The Honourable and Learned Gentleman has quoted from speeches during the discussions on the Reform Bill. I have adduced the opinion of Lord Althorp, after the close and settlement of the question; and Lord Althorp, then, in terms as explicit as he could possibly use, declared that, as a member of Lord Grey's Government, he was not at liberty to support the Ballot, though he had supported that question on a previous occasion. I am ready to leave the general question to rest on the speech of the Noble Lord. I was, however, struck with something singular that ran through the whole texture of the speech of the Honourable and Learned Member for Edinburgh. I am glad to see that Honourable Gentleman amongst us again, for I consider his superior talents an ornament to the House; but I was struck by some of the topics on which he dwelt. In the first place, the Honourable Member thinks, in the abstract, that the practice of open questions in Cabinets is the greatest good that can exist in any country with a free constitution; and he has cited as examples, the support given by Mr. Pitt — to the Reform question, and to the Slave Trade question — as a Minister; and he also cited Lord Grey as a witness to the expediency of that course. Now, I must say that I felt no small surprise at hearing that line of argument used by the Honourable Member; because I had always understood, that if there was any one thing which raised doubts as to the sincerity of Mr. Pitt's conduct, it was his leaving the question of Reform, and placing the suppression of the slave trade on that ambiguous footing, instead of giving it the weight and influence which it would have received by making it a Cabinet measure. Such were the opinions of Ponsonby, Tierney, Grenville, and Lord Grey, who spoke to that effect, I might say,

From morn till eve, from eve till dewy morn.

And I have, really, always understood that the doctrine of open questions has generally been viewed as nothing more nor less than a shabby escape from difficulties. The Honourable Gentleman has said, that members of a Cabinet, in questions of difficulty, and where they are divided in opinion, must take one of three courses; — they must, in such cases, either conceal, avow, or compromise their differences. But I think there is still a fourth course open, which has not been touched upon by the Honourable and Learned Member; and it is, that when members of a Cabinet are called upon by the majority of their colleagues to support measures of primary importance, which they do not approve, or to oppose measures which they are favourable to, there is, I think, a fourth course open to those in the minority, — namely, at once to resign their offices.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Opposition benches.]

I do not know what may be the feelings of the Noble Lord the Member for Stroud on such matters. But that Noble Lord has told us, there is a vast importance to be attached to this question, — in a late letter addressed to his constituents. I quote from memory, and may not be correct; but I believe the Noble Lord has said that it would not be expedient or wise to throw the constitution of the country again into the furnace for the purpose of re-casting — that it is not expedient to raise the anchor of the monarchy when storms threaten and clouds are lowering in the political horizon. He adds, that it would be impossible to adopt the Ballot, without admitting at the same time a very large extension of the suffrage; and that, in the present state of the country, that would be an experiment of the greatest difficulty and danger. The Noble Lord, then, cannot regard this as an indifferent question. The Noble Lord must consider the adoption of the Ballot either as safe or dangerous. If he think it dangerous, then, I say, he ought no longer to remain a member of a Government, the majority of whom are its open advocates and supporters. But if, on the other hand, he think it safe and expedient, then, I say, let him make the Ballot a Cabinet question, and bring the whole united force of the Government to bear upon it. For I conscientiously believe that it would be far better for the country to have a Government pledged fairly to the Ballot, — to give the question a fair field and no favour, — than to make it, in this manner, an open question; — those supporting the Government voting generally for the Ballot; and the Government, on the other hand: offering nothing but a hollow, specious resistance—a mere semblance without reality. It is as if a beleaguered citadel were to open its gates, and allow its soldiers, who were weary of the defence, to go forth and take part with the besiegers. I believe that it would be safer for this country — entertaining the opinion which I do of this measure — to have a Government, bearing about them the brand or revolutionary mark of the support of the Ballot — than to allow members of the Government, of great influence and of great power and ability, to take part on the popular side,— doubtful whether they are in a majority or not, — whilst those who honestly, but still forcibly, resist it, are dragging on an imperfect resistance, which, sooner or later, they must be sure, will end in defeat. But the effect of this plan of the Government is, that those members of the Cabinet who support the popular side obtain an undue advantage over those who oppose it; and, at last, the Cabinet will be broken up when it may be most dangerous to give way to popular impulse. The inevitable consequence of their present proceeding is, that those who take the popular side, although they may be inferior in talent or power to those who take a contrary view, will, ere long, supplant their colleagues. I know that this is the fate which awaits the Noble Lord. I rejoice at the gallantry with which the Noble Lord opposite has fought the battle this night; but if he consent to remain a member of the Government, by whom it is considered an open question, I am persuaded that his signal defeat is not far distant, and that that which the Noble Lord has declared would be most dangerous to the country, will ultimately succeed. The responsibility will then rest with him. For myself, while partaking of the views of the Noble Lord as I do, as to the danger of this measure, I, in the most unhesitating manner, and with a clear conscience, am quite resolved to oppose the motion of the Honourable Member for London, and by that decision to stand or fall.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — Having on more than one occasion expressed my opinions on this subject to the House ——

[Cries of "Divide, then!" and, "Question!"]

— I shall not intrude on their natural impatience to come to a division, by entering into any repetition of them at this time; but there were some remarks of the Right Honourable Baronet the Member for Pembroke, from which I so entirely dissent, that I cannot allow the debate to close without expressing that dissent, and the reasons on which it is founded. The Right Honourable Baronet has told the House that the Reform Bill is not final, as a measure of the Legislature of this country, — and has, indeed, admitted that no measure can be final, in that sense; but he says that it ought to be final and binding on the consciences of those who belong to the Cabinet by whom that measure was introduced, — that they ought not to become parties to any change. I am one of those who are most anxious to avoid any disturbance of that great national settlement which was effected by the Reform Bill in 1832; but I can never sit in this House, and allow it to be said, without expressing my dissent, that any Member of Parliament in the Government is right, consistently with his duty to his country or his constituents, to bind himself by pledges that shall fetter him in the exercise of his future conduct, under circumstances which he cannot foresee, and in a state of things of which he cannot be aware. I say that one Parliament cannot bind its successors; and for the same reason each individual Member of Parliament is bound to preserve his own freedom, to act according as future circumstances may render desirable for the interests of the country. Does not every Honourable Member recollect what was the case in dispute that occasioned the relinquishment of office by the Whig Government in 1807? Was it not because they refused to pledge themselves as to the advice they might, at some future time, offer to the Sovereign? And will any Honourable Member maintain that any person should be bound not to propose, under any circumstances, such measures of change as he may think best for the country? What the Cabinet which brought forward the Reform Bill bound themselves to, was this, — and only this, — that in proposing that measure they would not, in the then circumstances of the country, propose any further change. Indeed, after the manner in which the Reform Bill was introduced in 1831 and 1832, it would have been most improper for them to have done so. I think this manner of arriving at their intentions will account for the language of Lord Althorp in 1833. But is the House, on this ground, to say that, under totally different circumstances, we should not be at liberty to consider what might be desirable under those changes? For my own part, I will resist any further change from the Reform Bill, on the firm and reasonable principle which has been so ably and eloquently stated by the Honourable and Learned Member for Edinburgh. I believe that a series of changes in the constitution of political power is one of the greatest evils which can afflict any country. I believe that, having obtained [a reformed Legislature, so far as the representative system is concerned, we should apply it to those practical measures which directly bear on the welfare of the nation, and not foster vague hopes of advantage resulting from continual mutations. I contend, therefore, that as long as I see practical advantage resulting to the country under existing arrangements, to those arrangements I will adhere. I will be no party to petty or trifling reforms; but show me any grievance, such as existed in 1831, — convince me that the existing state of the representation of the country is not consistent with the welfare of the people generally, — and I am ready, now, as I was in 1831, to reconsider those arrangements, and to adopt such further reforms as may be necessary; but I am a decided opponent to what I consider needless change in the letter of the Reform Bill.

[Cries of "Divide, divide!"]

I am aware that I have already trespassed too long on the attention of the House; but I must say one word as to the subject of open questions, since the Right Honourable Baronet opposite has referred to it. On the general expediency of open questions, I must confess I agree more with the Right Honourable Baronet than with my Honourable Friend behind me. They are evils, certainly; but nevertheless are evils, which, to a greater or less extent, the Government of this country have, for a long series of years, been compelled to submit. The Right Honourable Baronet has quoted speeches, on this subject of open questions, of certain Members of the party to which I have the honour to belong; but the Right Honourable Baronet must remember that the greater part of those speeches were applicable only to one particular question, — and that was the Catholic question. And with respect to that question, I always felt that it was objectionable to make it an open question, because it was not a mere legislative question with the Government of that day, but one which affected the daily proceedings of the Executive. And the administration of Ireland was necessarily and practically affected by the individual opinions of the Ministers of the time; and I think I can trace many of the evils which Ireland has experienced so long to that fatal system of balancing a pro-Catholic Secretary by an anti-Catholic Lord Lieutenant. I hold that the effect of this is felt, even at this hour. But does any one tell me the Ballot is a question of this kind? Does the difference which exists between myself and my Right Honourable Friend the Member for Manchester, upon this question of the Ballot, prevent our acting perfectly well together upon matters of general administration?

[Laughter, and cries of "Oh!"]

I must say, when the Right Honourable Baronet tells us that, my Noble Friend having expressed a strong opinion against the Ballot, he is, in effect, giving indirect support to the measure by continuing to belong to a Government of which some of the members support it — that I am of a directly opposite opinion. In the present state of the country respecting the Ballot, and the subject in general, my firm opinion is, that if it were generally understood that a liberal system of policy ——

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and laughter.]

— I mean a system of policy which we, on this side, should be disposed to give our assent to, as distinguished from the policy of the other side, — that this could only be enforced by the Government professing themselves in favour of the Ballot, — my belief is, that in a few years we should have a Government professing the Ballot, and engaged to the country to carry that question. I therefore think that, instead of promoting that measure, the Government are, on the contrary, giving the best chance of resisting it, by considering it an open question. I have told the Honourable Member for London that I most decidedly differ from him on the subject of the Ballot. I am a decided opponent to the Ballot; and if I believed that, by continuing a member of a Government divided on this subject, I was advancing the period when it would be carried, I tell the House, that, to-morrow, I would cease to be a member of that Government.

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" and, "Oh, oh!"]

SIR ROBERT PEEL. — On the last occasion on which the question of the Ballot was discussed, I entered so fully into the subject, that I am unwilling, at the present time, to trouble the House with a repetition of my observations. All I will now say on this subject is, that my opinions remain unchanged; and I do not know that I should have risen at all, but for the doctrine laid down by the Honourable and Learned Member opposite, as to the policy of open questions. I must say, I participate with my Right Honourable Friend near me, in rejoicing at the return of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman (Mr. Macaulay); for however formidable an opponent he may be, and however powerful I may deem his opposition, yet I must say I feel so great an interest in the general character and reputation of Parliament, that I cannot regret the return of so distinguished and able a Member among us. If I had wanted an exemplification of the inconvenience and danger of open questions, I should have found it in the speech which has been just made by the Noble Lord the Secretary at War. That Noble Lord said that the consequence of making the Ballot an open question would be to retard the carrying of the Ballot. This may be a good reason for the Noble Lord to vote against it; but what must be the situation of his colleagues, who are friendly to the Ballot, and who think it would be an improvement in the representation, when they are told by the Noble Lord that the position in which they stand is most fatal to their hopes? What a tendency must it have to destroy the force of party, to destroy the reciprocal confidence of members of the Government, when they are allowed to vote in different ways upon questions of vital importance! I well remember the Catholic question, and all the inconveniences that arose from its being made an open question. But in what does the Ballot differ from that? According to the opinions of some of the colleagues of the Noble Lord, we are not to consider the abstract merits of the Ballot, but to look to the consequences of it; one of which consequences will be, to make extensive changes in the representation of the country. Can anything be more important than the Ballot, coupled, as it would be, with such consequences to this country? Take the opinion of the Noble Lord, in his letter to the electors of Stroud. The Noble Lord there said,—

I told you, at my election, not to expect that I should vote in favour of Ballot. I have expressed, in Parliament, the opinion that Ballot alone would not satisfy the people at large. Some rebuked me for mixing two questions altogether distinct; and some among my friends voted for Ballot, determined not to consent to an extension of the suffrage. It was with some satisfaction, therefore, that I saw, in the Morning Chronicle of March the 25th of the present year, this manifesto.

Now, I recollect, when the Noble Lord the Member for Dorsetshire referred to the Morning Chronicle, it was said by certain Honourable Members opposite, "We have no communication with the Morning Chronicle, and it is not to be referred to in this House." But when the Noble Lord wishes to make use of the Morning Chronicle, he can do so,—not merely quoting from it, but dignifying it by introducing extracts from it into his letter. The manifesto was this:—

Our first point of union is the Ballot. But the Ballot, combined with the present limited franchise, and in the present—which is likely to be the permanent—temper of the disfranchised, would be an unendurable anomaly. It would aggravate the existing breach between the middle and working classes.

The Noble Lord was here quoting from the Morning Chronicle; and continued,—"I entirely agree in this opinion." You talk of practical results following the Ballot,—and what are they? To aggravate the existing breach between the middle and working classes! Why, in the present state of this country, can there be a greater political evil than an increase of disunion between those classes? Embarrassing as was the division in the Cabinet as to the Catholic question, or the administration of Ireland,—was that so grave an evil as, according to the Noble Lord's own showing, must be the division of the Cabinet on a question which, if carried, will widen the existing breaches between the different classes of society? The Noble Lord went on to say,—

I believe, if the Ballot could be made effectual, those who have no votes would be far more discontented than they now are. Ballot is suited to an absolute government of the few, or a free government where the suffrage is universal. The absolute aristocracy of Venice used it in its perfection; the people of the United States use it,—it accords with their principle, "that the majority is to govern." The will of the people of the United States is supreme; it has no check; and every one shares in the sovereignty. But for the middle classes of this country to pretend to an irresponsible and secret power over the destinies of the country, would be as the Morning Chronicle says, "an unendurable anomaly."

This is the opinion which the Noble Lord conscientiously entertains as to the Ballot; he thinks it would be an "unendurable anomaly." The Noble Lord (Lord Howick) has admitted the practical inconvenience of open questions; and says that he only agrees to allow this one to be such, from the hope of defeating it. The Honourable and Learned Member opposite (Mr. Macaulay) says the practice of open questions should prevail more than it has hitherto done, and that there ought to be exceptions in two cases, only.

Mr. MACAULAY.—I spoke historically: it was so fifty years ago.

SIR ROBERT PEEL.—The Honourable and Learned Gentleman's principle is—open questions; and he says that there are only two exceptions to the rule. One exception is, when an attack is made on the Government; and the other, when the Government bring forward public measures. In those the Government, according to the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, should be united; but the Honourable Member must see that the tendency of making open questions is to prevent public measures being brought forward by the Government. You would thus reduce the Government into a state of neutrality in public affairs, and they would always avoid to determine the dilemma they might be placed in by not bringing forward any measures at all.

Digitized by Google

That was the state to which they were reduced on the Catholic question; the case was the same as to the Corn Law; and it is now the same as to the Ballot. Possibly the corn law question might be brought to a satisfactory arrangement, if the existing Government were united in opinion on that subject; but if you hold the doctrine of making those open questions, which, if close, would endanger the existence of the Government, you hold out an inducement to the Government to shrink from the proper exercise of its functions. Thus, the only Member of the House who could not propose any measure, would be a member of her Majesty's Government. They who, it is supposed, ought to lead the public mind in matters of legislation, —they who have the best means of access to important information,—would be incapacitated from submitting these matters to the Legislature; and whilst every other Gentleman, being a Member of the House, could propose such measures, the Government would be precluded from offering their views in a legislative form. Depend upon it, to make a vital question an open question, is to destroy the obligations of party connections. If this principle were admitted, I know no reason why Gentlemen of opposite principles on important political points, should not unite together, and form a Government, on the understanding that they should cautiously abstain from touching upon those questions on which they might not happen to agree? I know, from experience, that the effect of such a course would be to sow the seeds of disunion among the members of the Cabinet. How, for instance, would the Government administer their patronage? Each would be sincere in his opinions; and each would be asked by those who agreed with him, whether he had taken effectual means to support his own opinions? and would not each appointment be canvassed both by those who wished to maintain those opinions, as to what one would hold to be an essential alteration, and another a dangerous innovation? These are the grounds on which I cannot agree with the Honourable and Learned Gentleman. As my Right Honourable Friend (Sir J. Graham) has said, an imputation has been cast upon Mr. Pitt for the course he took with respect to the slave trade, and on parliamentary reform. It was constantly objected to him that he contrived to get defeated upon those questions by his own colleagues; and it was distinctly shown that much inconvenience was experienced in the result. The same thing occurred with respect to the Catholic question; and an outcry was raised against the Ministers, that they had abandoned the functions of the Government. Whatever the practice may have been in former years on this point, I think I may well refer to the evidence of Mr. Burke to show what inconvenience has been felt in the Cabinet in consequence of open questions.

The Honourable and Learned Gentleman will, doubtless, recollect the expressions of Mr. Burke respecting the Administration of Lord Chatham. He described it as being so chequered and so speckled a piece of machinery — such a piece of mosaic work — such a species of tesselated pavement, diversified with all colours, — "here a bit of white and there a bit of black," — Whigs and Tories, treacherous friends and open enemies, — that it presented a curious spectacle, but too unsafe to touch, and too unsound to stand. I remember that Mr. Tierney — bearing in mind, possibly, these observations of Mr. Burke — compared a similar Cabinet, not to a tesselated pavement, but to the alternating series of the black and white keys of a pianoforte. If the doctrine of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman were correct, there cannot be any reason why I and my friends near me should not walk over to the opposite benches, and conduct the government on the principle of "open questions," and on the honourable understanding, not only that we should not bring forward measures on which any difference of opinion might be entertained, but that we should, as far as possible, prevent others from bringing them forward. As I have referred to the speech of the Honourable and Learned Gentleman, I wish to answer one or two other points, ——

[Loud cries of "Divide!"]

But I will refrain. On the last occasion, I fully stated my opinion on the subject of the Ballot; and I should weary myself, and, I am sure, weary the House, by a repetition of former arguments. I still adhere to that opinion; and I will now content myself with expressing my objection to the principle of open questions.

Mr. GROTE. — I have tendered a cure for a great evil, the existence of which is admitted on all hands, and has been denied by none. I have endeavoured to show that, if the Ballot be not the remedy for it, no remedy can be found: and when the Noble Lord the Member for Stroud talks of intimidation going out of itself, I should like to know what the Noble Lord would have said if a similar argument had been used with respect to the evils of Canada? The real effect of open voting is, to increase the power of the rich, and not that of the poor; and when the Noble Lord speaks of the Chartists, and the discontent and sufferings of the middle classes, in consequence of the influence of the poorer classes, the Noble Lord is not aware that the influence of the poorer classes over men's votes is nothing like the influence exercised by the rich. There is no reason to suppose that the Chartists would be more discontented if the Ballot were granted than they are now; or that more demands would be made for extended suffrage than are already made. One word, only, as to the observations of the Noble Lord the Member for Northumberland. I have taken a note of the Noble Lord's avowal of the reason why he consented to make this an open question; and the Noble Lord may depend upon it, that the friends of the Ballot, both within and out of the House, will take a note of it also. After what the Noble Lord has publicly proclaimed, there will not be any great gratitude to him, on their part, for this being made an open question. It has been explained by the Noble Lord, that the larger half of the Cabinet make this an open question for the purpose of spoiling it.

[Cries of "No, no!"]

If such be not the intention of the larger half of the Cabinet, I am glad of it; but that is the avowed opinion of the Noble Lord himself. It stands recorded, that some Gentlemen in the Cabinet have made this an open question for the purpose of interposing a material impediment in the future progress of the Ballot; and when the friends of the Ballot weigh this avowal, I think there will be no additional feeling in favour of the Government in consequence of their so making this an open question.

LORD VISCOUNT HOWICK. — A word in explanation. With reference to what the Honourable Member for London has attributed to me, he appears to attach more importance to my words than they deserve. I expressed my own opinion only; and those of my Honourable Friends near me, who take a different view from me of the question of the Ballot, will also take a different view of the effect of making this an open question.

The House then divided: — Ayes 216; Noes 333; — Majority against the motion 117.

AYES.

METROPOLIS POLICE AND METROPOLIS POLICE COURTS (ADVANCES OUT OF THE CONSOLIDATED FUND).

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I have now to move that the House resolve itself into a committee, to take into consideration the advances out of the Consolidated Fund requisite for the Metropolitan Police and Metropolitan Courts Bill.

Mr. LAW. — I wish to know from the Honourable Gentleman, whether the votes to be taken are for the Metropolitan Police, or the Metropolitan Police Courts Bill? If any of the votes are for the latter Bill, I shall feel called upon to oppose them. I also wish to know whether any larger grant is to be taken than was voted formerly? For instance, I find in one of the clauses of the Police Courts Bill the sum of 50,000*l.* inserted for building and other purposes.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — The votes are undoubtedly for both Bills. It is necessary that this preliminary step should be taken before we proceed with either of them. I do my duty in urging them from day to day; but, of course, it is with the House to say whether they shall progress.

Mr. LAW. — It is my intention to oppose the Police Courts Bill; and this being one of the preparatory stages of that Bill, I must object to the vote being taken at this late hour.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — The Honourable and Learned Gentleman will have an opportunity of discussing every clause of the Bill when in committee, and to oppose it if he think necessary. I should state, in reply to the question the Honourable and Learned Gentleman just now put to me, that there certainly is a slight increase in the vote; for instance, a superannuation fund is to be formed, and an increase is to be made in the salaries of the Commissioners of Police.

Mr. LAW. — I have given notice of my intention to oppose the motion for the House going into committee on the Police Courts Bill, to which I entertain strong objections; and, considering that the step now proposed is to pledge the House to an increased expenditure, I shall feel bound to take the sense of the House against the motion of the Honourable Member, if it be persisted in.

COLONEL SIBTHORP. — My opposition is not confined to the Police Courts Bill. I shall take a straightforward course; and, if the Honourable Member persist in his motion, I shall be compelled to trouble you, Sir, to count the House.

Mr. FOX MAULE. — I have no wish to press the motion against the feeling of the House, and will therefore postpone the committee till to-morrow.

Committee accordingly deferred till to-morrow.

Adjourned at a quarter after two o'clock.

Norwich Improvement Bill. — Reported; to be ingrossed.

London Corporation Estate Bill; London City Police Bill. — Third readings deferred till Friday.

South Eastern Railway (No. 2.) Bill. Read a third time; amendments made; Bill passed.

Warrington Small Debts Bill; Grantham Small Debts Bill. — Committees revived; leave to sit and proceed on Friday.

Manchester and Leeds Railway Bill. — Lords' amendments agreed to.

Moy Navigation Bill. — Read a third time, and passed.

ALLISON'S DIVORCE BILL.

Order (18th June) for committing the Bill to a committee of the whole House, read.

Mr. W. PATTEN. — I move, Sir, that the order for committing this Bill to a committee of the whole House be discharged, and that the Bill be committed to Mr. ORD and the South Northumberland list. I do not make this motion on any ground connected with the merits of the Bill, but only because I think the evidence will be better sifted and considered by a select committee; I shall also move that the evidence taken before the House of Lords upon oath be laid before that committee.

Mr. CHRISTOPHER. — I second the motion, in the hope that, in every future Session of Parliament, a committee will be specially nominated to consider Bills of this nature.

Mr. FRESHFIELD. — Too much caution cannot be observed in the proceedings under Divorce Bills, which are really Bills of Pains and Penalties, and I certainly think that the appointment of a judicial committee for the purpose of considering and deciding on all such questions would be a great improvement on the present practice of hearing evidence at the bar before a committee of the whole House.

Mr. GREENE. — The motion of the Honourable Member involves a principle of considerable importance, inasmuch as it goes to establish a change in the practice of the House; and I regret that it should have been mooted in so thin a House. I consider the existing mode of our procedure in Divorce Bills in this House to be perfectly disgraceful; and I do believe that nine tenths of the Members present have not the slightest idea of the evidence elicited at the bar in such cases. The whole business is so disgraceful that I think strangers ought, on such occasions, to be excluded. In the mean time, I trust that the further discussion of this question will be postponed till we have a fuller attendance of Members.

Mr. W. PATTEN. — I have no objection to postpone the discussion. The House, in consequence of the scene that took place upon the examination of witnesses on the last Divorce Bill, clearly evinced a wish to avoid the recurrence of such matters. For that reason, I have taken the subject up. I am of opinion that a special committee should be appointed to examine the evidence on all such questions; but it is too late to carry out that plan this Session; and I therefore propose, as the next best course, that this Bill should be referred to a committee, according to the course usually followed on Private Bills.

Mr. ESTCOURT. — It certainly is too late to propose the appointment of a special committee at this period of the Session; but, in the mean time, I think it more desirable to follow the course proposed by my Honourable Friend the Member for North Lancashire, than to have any repetitions of the scene to which he has alluded. I therefore hope that the Honourable Member for Lancaster will withdraw his objection to the motion.

Order discharged; Bill committed to Mr. ORD and the South Northumberland list; leave to committee to sit and proceed on Wednesday next.

Ordered, That a Message be sent to the Lords, to request that their Lordships will communicate to this House a copy of the evidence taken before their Lordships in the case of Allison's Divorce Bill.

RETURNS.

Bank of Ireland. — On the motion of Mr. HUME, Return ordered —

Of the actual amount of the Government balances in the hands of the Bank of Ireland on the 28th day of February, the 31st day of May, the 31st day of August, and the 30th day of November, in each year, from the year 1820 to the year 1839.

Similar Return for the same period, of the average amount in each quarter, ended the 1st day of January, the 1st day of April, the 1st day of July, and the 1st day of October.

JAMAICA LAWS BILL.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I move that the Order of the Day for the third reading of the Jamaica Laws Bill be now read.

Mr. HUME. — I beg to be informed whether any answer has been sent to the request of the House of Assembly, praying her Majesty's Government to tell them whether they will be allowed to legislate for the colony, as they are entitled to do, or whether the colony is still to be governed by the Order in Council?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I think the Honourable Member has entirely misunderstood the nature of the demand made by the House of Assembly, which amounts to a request that the Ministers of the Crown will give up the right of parliamentary legislation. It is quite impossible for the Crown to give up that power, and therefore no answer has been given to the request of the House of Assembly.

Mr. HUME. — I protest against such an interpretation of the language used by the House of Assembly. If I were to read that request, I would convince the House that the Noble Lord is in error. All that the House of Assembly has done is, to ask a simple question, which any man of common sense could have replied to. I will not now express any opinion on the Prisons Bill; but this House, by that Bill, having interfered, and taken from the House of Assembly the power of legislating for the internal affairs of the colony, the House of Assembly wish to know whether they are yet at liberty to legislate for their internal affairs, because it is no use for them to proceed with legislation, if they do not obtain an assurance that their legislation will not be interfered with. All that the resolutions declare is, —

That an Act of the British Parliament, intituled, "An Act for the better Government of Prisons in the West Indies," is a violation of our inherent rights as British subjects, as recognised by the constitution of this island, and the Act of Parliament 18 Geo. III. c. 12. That the same has not, and ought not, to have the force of law in this island, and that the authorities will not be justified in acting on it. That the violation of our rights by the Parliament of Great Britain, in which we are not represented, is the less excusable, inasmuch as the House was prepared to enter into the consideration of prison discipline, as soon as the Report of her Majesty's commissioner was officially before them. Therefore, that, in the opinion of this House, they will best consult their own honour, the rights of their constituents, and the peace and wellbeing of the colony, by abstaining from the exercise of any legislative functions, excepting such as may be necessary to preserve inviolate the faith of the island with the public creditor, until her Most Gracious Majesty's pleasure shall be made known, whether her subjects of Jamaica, now happily all in a state of freedom, are henceforth to be treated as subjects, with the power of making laws, as hitherto, for their own government, or whether they are to be treated as a conquered colony, and governed by parliamentary legislation, Orders in Council, or, as in the case of the late amended Abolition Act, by investing the Governor of the island with the arbitrary power of issuing proclamations, having the force of law over the lives and properties of the people.

I contend that the fair interpretation of that request is, not that they have refused to legislate, but that, Parliament having interfered, they wish to know whether they are to be permitted to legislate, or not? No answer has yet been sent to that request; and on that ground I take my stand against these proceedings on the part of the Government.

Mr. LABOUCHERE. — The statement of the Honourable Gentleman the Member for Kilkenny, upon the subject, is quite erroneous, as regards the spirit which actuated the House of Assembly of Jamaica. The question they ask, in fact, is, "Will you, on the part of the Government and of the Parliament, assure the House of Assembly of Jamaica that the Parliament will deal with it in a different manner from that which it has hitherto acted in?" Of course, the Government can give no such pledge. But, in considering what course the Government ought to take, I would remind Honourable Members of the resolution to which this House came by a large majority, in which, if I am not mistaken, the Honourable Member for Kilkenny himself voted. After the Abolition Act Amendment Bill was passed, the House came to a solemn resolution, by which they deliberately determined that they would continue to watch over the negro, and, if necessary, that they would interfere for his protection. The resolution was agreed to on the 29th of May, 1838, and is to this effect: —

That this House, at the same time, declares its opinion that no means should be omitted which can tend to secure to the negro population of her Majesty's colonies the privileges to which they are entitled under the Act for the Abolition of Slavery, and under the Act for the Amendment of the Slavery Abolition Act; and, further, that the anxious attention of this House will be directed to the state and condition of the negro population, when the expiration of the term of apprenticeship shall have entitled them to the full enjoyment of entire freedom.

Now, I put it to the House, who know what are the resolutions which have been passed by the House of Assembly, and who know what complaints have been made by them, to couple those resolutions and complaints with the demand made by the Assembly, that the Government would deal with them in a different manner from that in which they have hitherto dealt with them; and I would ask the House, whether the Government would not have been guilty of an act of the grossest delusion, if they had used any language to Jamaica which would have induced the Assembly to imagine that Parliament is in any way disposed to relax its vigilance on behalf of the negro? I feel that no justification is wanting on the part of the Government for proceeding with this Bill; for, if there be any fault to be found with the conduct of the Government, it is for having pushed forbearance to the very limits of weakness, and for having been too slow to act. I approve of the Abolition Act; and, approving of it, I think that the Government ought not to use any language which might countenance any delusion on the part of the Assembly of Jamaica, — since we are determined, if the Assembly will not do their duty, to do it for them.

The Order of the Day having been read, —

Mr. LABOUCHERE said : — In moving that the Jamaica Bill be read a third time, I will take this opportunity of stating that I have considered the objection taken by the Right Honourable and Learned Member for Ripon, relative to the time at which the Governor in council shall proceed to legislate, if the Assembly shall not have previously legislated. In proposing this Bill, I said that it was far from my intention to fix a period which would not give the Assembly ample time to legislate; and instead of the 1st day of October next, I mean to fill up the blank with the words "the 15th day of November."

Mr. T. DUNCOMBE. — Supposing that this Bill shall be passed, will it be administered by the present Governor of Jamaica?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL. — I believe that Sir Lionel Smith, the present Governor of Jamaica, either has been, or is about to be, appointed Governor of the Mauritius, — so that it cannot be administered by him.

Mr. HUME. — As there is to be a division on the first clause, I will, now, simply enter my protest against the third reading of the Bill, but will not divide against it.

Bill read a third time.

On the question, "That the Bill do pass," being put, —

Mr. GOULBURN said: — As this is a subject which, on a former occasion, was amply discussed, and as there is another question which stands for this evening, possessing universal interest, I think I shall best consult my duty by compressing within a very narrow compass, indeed, the observations with which I shall preface the motion I am about to make. The first point I shall refer to is one of form. I had intended to move the omission of all the words in the first clause; but if I were to do that, I should preclude the Right Honourable Gentleman from making that alteration in the date which he wishes to effect. I shall therefore propose to leave out all the words of the clause up to the date; and if I succeed in this motion, I will then move to omit the remaining portion of the clause. If I correctly understand what has already taken place in the House, and the assurance which has been given by the Government, I must believe that the Government, bonâ fide, wish to give the Assembly the power and the opportunity of continuing to legislate for Jamaica, and that they are sincerely desirous that the popular branch of the Legislature should not be placed in abeyance. Giving them, therefore, credit for their sincerity, I cannot see how they can oppose the motion which I am about to make, — since the first clause in the Bill must necessarily tend to produce feelings in the Assembly, which will make it impossible for any man to sit and legislate as a member of that body. It is not likely that men who have been sent back to their constituents, and have received their sanction and approbation, will, now, retrace their steps. These are the difficulties of the case; but I think these difficulties may be surmounted. I have seen letters from members of the House of Assembly, stating that the Assembly is not indisposed to conciliatory proceedings. It should be recollected that the resolutions of the Assembly were carried by a minority of the whole body, — by 21 out of 45 members. I think it fair, therefore, to infer that the House of Assembly does not entertain, as a body, the strong opinions which some Members of the House have expressed; and that, if an opportunity be given to them, they will act in accordance with the wishes of the Government. It is for this reason that I do not wish to retain the objectionable clause. I will not say one word upon the topics which have been touched upon before; — I will not say one word about the conduct of the Government; — I will say nothing which can have any tendency to excite angry feeling. I will merely state that the laws which it is proposed to enact, render it extremely difficult to carry into effect the object which the Government profess to have in view. I do not know whether the Honourable Gentlemen opposite have read those laws, the passing of which was made a condition of non-interference by the Governor in council; but, in the multitude of papers which have been laid upon the table of the House, I am afraid — and the smile of the Right Honourable Gentleman confirms my apprehensions, — that they have not given to those laws the perusal to which they are well entitled. The clause directs that the House of Assembly shall pass, in principle, the same laws as those which were mentioned in the Orders in Council; and it is professed that those laws should be limited to contract, vagrancy, and squatting. Now, I will show that it is impossible for the House of Assembly, if their object be only the public good, to assent to that proposition.

[Cries of "Divide!"]

I am sorry to trespass upon the time of the House, and I can assure Honourable Members I shall confine myself to one or two points, in regard to which I am convinced the House will go along with me in opinion that the Assembly could not possibly consent so such laws. I will take the contract laws as an example. The contract laws, proposed to the House of Assembly, go to repeal all the former contract laws; and whether they are to be retrospective, or not, is not quite clear: but I apprehend there is no intention that they should be so. In the next place, it is provided that no contract between master and servant shall be made beyond the limits of the colony, and that all such contracts shall endure for one year only. Now, what is the effect of that provision? I speak, now, as an individual cognizant of the facts. It has been my lot, as it has been that of almost every West India proprietor, and from motives entirely unquestionable, to engage persons in this country under contracts for the term of three, four, five, or even seven years, to be employed on their estates in Jamaica as coopers, carpenters, and ploughmen. It is one great object of the planters, and of the Assembly also, to introduce agricultural improvements into the colony; and the attainment of that object could not fail to diminish the labour of the negroes, and, of consequence, render more practicable the cultivation of the colony. It is, therefore, no less desirable to the planters than to the negroes, and to the friends of humanity, that every facility should be afforded for the purpose of introducing an improved system of cultivation; but if the contract laws which are proposed be adopted by the Assembly, that improvement will be greatly retarded. Is it likely that any person would consent to leave this country and to go out to Jamaica, without having a certainty of employment for some years? Would any persons be so rash as to enter into an engagement in this country with the knowledge that the engagement into which they might enter here would be invalid there; and with the certainty that, when they arrived in the colony with a contract for seven years, that contract would be of no force? Is it possible that the House of Assembly, if they wish to promote the agricultural prosperity of Jamaica, can assent to a proposition which would entirely preclude the sending out of servants from this country — servants who are most valuable to their masters, and who are of little less value to the negroes themselves, because they communicate to them a knowledge of the most improved modes of cultivating the land? Then, again, look at the inequality of the law. The law between master and servant is, that if the servant injure the property of his master, a pecuniary fine is imposed. That is fair; and so far I agree with the provisions of the law; but then, there is no power of levying the fine upon the servant, given by the Order in Council. If the servant set fire to his master's property, the fine to be imposed for that offence could not be levied by distress; but if the master should neglect to furnish the servant with anything specified in the contract, the servant could recover damages by distress. The master is obliged to have recourse to an action of debt to recover from the servant, whereas the servant may recover from the master, immediately, by distress. Then, again, the servant, for an offence against the master, may be imprisoned for the term of fourteen days; but if the master injure the servant, by violating any of the articles of the contract, the master may be imprisoned for a month.

Sir, I have one more objection to take. The Act to which I have been alluding affects the whole judicial system of the colony, and cannot fail seriously to injure the interests of justice. What are the provisions of this law? It provides for the holding of petty sessions; and how are those sessions to be held? It is provided that there shall, in every court of petty sessions, be not less than two stipendiary magistrates; and they are to have the option of not admitting more than one of the local magistrates. Now, I would ask, whether anything could be more unjust than such a provision? whether anything could have been devised, more likely to destroy that confidence which it is of so much importance should exist between the negroes and the proprietors of the colony? Besides, the appointment of magistrates is vested in the Crown; and what necessity is there, therefore, for asking the House of Assembly to legislate at all upon the subject? Can it be called a conciliatory proceeding, to go to the House of Assembly, the members of which are themselves magistrates, and ask them to pass a measure which would reduce them to a position similar to that of the wild animal in the story, when placed between two tame elephants? By such a step we should degrade justice, and create a feeling of hostility in the minds of the local magistracy, which could not fail to prove injurious to the best interests of the colony. The admission of such a man, even, as my Lord Seaford, into a court of petty sessions, is to be made dependent upon the will of two stipendiary magistrates; and I would ask any Member of this House, what his feelings would be if he was told he should only sit in a court of petty sessions by permission of two paid London magistrates? I shall not trouble the House further, as I think I have said enough to show the impolicy of the first clause of this Bill; and I shall therefore move that the words of the clause which I have specified be left out.

Mr. HUME said: — Sir, my objection to this Bill is to its general principle, and not to any clause in particular; although I admit that, when compared with the last Bill, it is much less offensive. This measure is much more constitutional than the last, for it does not suspend the constitution of the colony, or impose any tax; but still it authorises an interference with the powers of the Assembly, which I feel myself obliged to protest against. Where is the necessity for this measure? I deny that any case of necessity has been made out; and there is not one document upon the table of the House by which it can be shown that this measure is required in order to secure the peace or prosperity of the colony. It is therefore upon principle that I object to this Bill. For what purpose do we interpose? Is it to protect the negroes, or to secure the tranquillity of the colony? No such thing. The country is in a state of the most profound tranquillity, and all the interests of the colony are prosperous. The Noble Lord will not legislate for Canada, which is in a state of anarchy; but he asks us to legislate for Jamaica, which reposes in profound peace. I will produce documents to the House to show that this is the case. I hold in my hand a letter from Mr. J. M. Phillipps to Mr. Sturge, who has taken so much interest in the condition of the negroes, in which that gentleman says, —

I am exceedingly concerned to find that the planters have succeeded in creating the panic to which you allude. They have made a desperate effort to do this, and they have succeeded. It is currently reported here, that the London journalists, who have lately manifested so much sympathy with our late slave-masters, have been bought for that purpose; and they have certainly shown themselves, especially the professedly anti-aristocratical part of them, by no means insensible to bribes. Should the Government at all listen to the misrepresentations of the pro-slavery party, it will be a most lamentable circumstance,—as it would but revive the differences of which they complain, and which are now almost universally set at rest. The most profound tranquillity universally prevails. Our courts of justice seldom now behold a criminal; and the absence of ordinary offences from the calendar is often the subject of gratulation by the judge. The business of the estates and pens is almost in every instance being proceeded with; innumerable spots are being recovered by small settlers from the wastes; new villages are rapidly rising up in every direction; land is nearly double the value it was a few months ago; estates and small farms are seldom in the market, — and when they are, although greatly augmented in value, there is no want of purchasers.

That was the state of the colony on the 5th of May in the present year. Mr. Phillipps goes on to say, —

The advantages resulting from the new state of things in the towns are too palpable to admit of a single question. New houses are being erected, or old ones are undergoing repairs, in almost every street. The markets are abundantly supplied with provisions; the comforts and wants of civilised life are increasingly desired and possessed; merchants and traders have more employment than formerly; and intimations of the decrease of commerce, of the decline of agriculture, and of the ruin of the country, are nowhere to be seen. So far are we from being likely to realise the dismal scenes predicted by the enemies of freedom, that the very reverse may be confidently expected. Not only is this fact proclaimed by the avidity with which properties are purchased when exposed for sale; by the increased price of land; together with the host of other evidence; but, also, by the efforts that are being made for the improvement of agriculture; by the designs in contemplation, both for the manufacture and transport of produce, — in the more general introduction of machinery and in the construction of railroads; by the various public institutions which are beginning to rise into being; and by the conversions that are daily taking place, to the advantage of the new state of things, among proprietors and attorneys, themselves. The strongest evidence is offered, by everything we see and hear around us, that we enjoy the dawn of a brighter day in every respect than Jamaica has ever yet beheld.

Now, if all this be true, where, I would ask, is the necessity for interference with local legislation? There is another letter, dated the 2d of May, from Mr. Clerk, who, I know, is a person on whose authority the House may depend. That gentleman says, —

The people are going on admirably. On almost every sugar estate in this part of the parish there is as much sugar-making, I believe, as during the apprenticeship. I can mention Orange Valley (nearly all the people on which are connected with my church), Cape Valley, Borough Bridge, and Greenock, where the people are employed by the job, or at 1*s.* 8*d.* per day, with houses and grounds: they are working well. At Dumbarton, Antrim, Culloden, Ballantry, although the people were not paid more than at other places, they are charged from 3*s.* 4*d.* to 6*s.* 8*d.* per week rent; yet there is no real cause of complaint. They are also working well, although for less than their neighbours; but this I do not expect to continue. These estates must either pay the market price for labour, or lose their people, if land can be bought in the neighbourhood. There is one interesting fact which I cannot forbear mentioning; — that from the time of Rawlinson's (the late special justice) removal, to the end of the apprenticeship, but two persons connected as members or inquirers with my station were punished, — and those improperly or unjustly. From the 1st of August to this date, not one has been imprisoned for any crime, although nearly 30,000 in number; indeed, in the whole district with which, as a minister, I have to do, in which there is a negro population of 9000 or 10,000, full half of which attend my ministry, but one black person has been committed to prison, — and that for an assault, which, I think, was compromised. We have no police, and we need none. Were it not for the disputes respecting wages and rents, the stipendiary magistrates would have a sinecure situation. I was very sanguine respecting the working of freedom. My expectations are more than realised. Give God the glory!

Now, when such is the state of the colony, where, I would ask, is to be found the necessity for this interference by the Imperial Parliament? Let the Noble Lord look at the Report of Captain Pringle, and he will find that the grossest delusion prevails with respect to this Bill. What is the opinion of Lord Brougham upon this measure — of him who has done so much for the emancipation of the negroes? This Bill is said to be for the protection of the negroes; but Lord Brougham has said that there never was a grosser delusion than that which prevails with respect to this Bill. There is no necessity for such a measure, and this interference with the Legislature of the colony can only be productive of injury. Captain Pringle has demonstrated that in the course of a few years the negroes will be the electors, and that they will have the power of returning the members of the House of Assembly. But this Bill will prevent the negroes from obtaining that which, alone, can distinguish them from slaves. Emancipation has given them all the privileges which were formerly enjoyed by the whites; and when the act of emancipation is complete, the number of persons exercising the elective franchise will be doubled. It is, therefore, because the first clause of this Bill interferes, without even a show of necessity, with the legislative rights of the people of the colony, that I shall give it every opposition in my power.

LORD J. RUSSELL. — Sir, the Honourable Gentleman who has just sat down divided his argument into two parts; one was that in which he argued against the Bill that was formerly before the House, and the other part was directed against the third reading of the Bill which was carried about twenty minutes ago. To the question now before the House, the Honourable Gentleman has not addressed one single argument; for the question before the House is, the adoption or rejection of this clause. I can understand, very well, the line of argument taken by those who object to our legislating for the House of Assembly of Jamaica, and who are for allowing the Legislature of Jamaica to take their own course. But when that question was put, there was but one Gentleman who said "No;" and even that Honourable Member, though the House was so full, repented of his opposition, and allowed the Bill to be read a third time. Therefore, there is no question in the House as to an interference with the Legislature of Jamaica. The Right Honourable Gentleman (Mr. Goulburn) alluded to the probability of many Members of this House not having read the Orders of Council; to which it may be replied, that there are many Members who did not hear the arguments of the learned counsel at the bar, who lately appeared there as the agent of the House of Assembly of Jamaica. It may be a matter of surprise to some, that the speech of that learned counsel should have made so little impression. Though it was a very able speech, and went much into the case, it was entirely founded, not on this clause of the Bill, but upon the second clause. The learned counsel, as representative of the House of Assembly of Jamaica, did not argue that the Orders in Council were oppressive and inapplicable; he did not attempt to show that their provisions were not adapted to the state of Jamaica; he did not, in the least, impugn the statement made, — that they had been six months in operation in other colonies, and that no practical fault had, there, been found with them; — but he confined his whole argument to the second clause; and, taking part with the constitutional rights of Jamaica, I think the learned counsel argued very properly with respect to the second clause, and not the first, — because it was the second, and not the first, which enabled the Governor and council to continue certain taxes that would otherwise expire; and he argued, that according to the Act of 1778, and according to constitutional notions, the power given to the Governor of enforcing taxes, and thus far interfering with the constitution of Jamaica, was an experiment on that constitution which ought not to be tried, and a power which this House ought not to grant. I will not repeat, nor even attempt to give a sketch of, his argument; but it went very fairly against the House giving such power to the Governor and council. The House was not convinced by it; and I own I was a little surprised when the Right Honourable and Learned Member for Ripon — who, I thought, had listened with great attention to the speech of the learned counsel — got up, at the end of that speech, and said, that when the House, in the following week, should come to the consideration of the subject, he would move the rejection of the first clause from the Bill. So little was he convinced by the arguments of the learned representative of Jamaica, that he allowed to go by, entirely, the clause to which he objected, and directed his opposition against the clause which the learned counsel would have allowed to remain. That is the clause to which objection is now made; but, if we were to leave that clause out of the Bill, we should prevent certain laws from being made for the protection of the negroes, for the prevention of vagrancy, and for guarding against the unlawful occupation of lands, — while, at the same time, we should not maintain the rights of the House of Assembly. The Honourable Member for Kilkenny — who, no doubt, will allow of the passing of this law — will, in effect, consent to an interference with the constitutional rights of the House of Assembly, against which this clause, which it is proposed to omit, will have no effect whatever. I can only say that these Orders have been in operation a considerable time, and there has been scarcely any objection at all urged against them hitherto. If any objections are to be made, I think they would be more rationally made against the second clause of the Bill; at all events, the constitutional question entirely depends on that clause.

SIR R. PEEL.—Sir, I would willingly give way to the impatience of the House, if I thought that, by so yielding, I should at all assist the House in doing that which would be creditable to itself; but, as this is a question which affects one of our most important colonies, I feel bound to obtrude on the patience of the House,—not for any gratification of my own feelings, but because I am persuaded that the House of Commons would place itself, if they were to adopt this Bill, in a discreditable position. The Noble Lord has found it convenient to compliment the speech of the learned counsel who appeared at the bar on behalf of the House of Assembly; and I have always observed the Noble Lord most ready to compliment that speech which did him the least damage. The Noble Lord said, that the speech of the learned counsel was a most constitutional speech, because it was directed against the second clause of the Bill, and not against the first. And what did the speech of the agent of Jamaica prove? It proved that we are not partisans of the Island of Jamaica. It proved that we are not acting in concert with the agent of the House of Assembly. We take that course which is the just course. We will provide against those emergencies which the Right Honourable Gentleman told us might occur if the House of Assembly should refuse to exercise their functions, and against the anarchy which he depicted. We yield to his opinion, and say, "We are willing to provide against those contingencies, and to supply the defects of the Colonial Legislature." But you go further, and provide for the permanent legislation of Jamaica — while, at the same time, you declare your intention and wish that the House of Assembly should resume its functions. How do you hope that the House of Assembly will resume its functions, and be a useful instrument of legislation, if you pass this Bill? You say to the House of Assembly,—"Unless you pass three separate and most important laws, relating to the domestic legislation of the colony, you, yourselves, shall be suspended, and the Governor and council shall execute your functions." You give them six weeks to pass these laws; and I ask you, do you feel this to be decorous? Have you, here, made such progress in legislation, that you should assign this term or limit? You, the House of Commons, when you look at your own course with respect to church rates, with respect to Irish tithes, with respect to joint stock banks, and with respect to legislation for Canada, and remember that you have postponed every practical measure till 1842, — do you think it decorous to tell the Colonial Legislature of Jamaica, that unless, in six weeks, they pass three most important measures, you give them notice that you will suspend their constitutional functions? What I deprecate is this, — that you are going to give that House of Assembly a great advantage over you: it is in the wrong now; and you are going to reverse your relative positions, and place yourselves in that situation. I never felt more strongly on any question. If the House of Assembly neglect its duty to this country, — if it neglect the welfare of the inhabitants and of the negro population, — if I am convinced of the fact of intentional and continued neglect, — I mean to give the Government every support in arrogating to the British Imperial Parliament the power and right to legislate for the welfare of the people of Jamaica. But I feel that we are embarrassing the question by the course which we are now adopting. We are not reserving to Parliament the power of deciding when the emergency shall arise; but we are referring to the Governor and council the right to determine what should be done. A threat is held over them, that, if they do not perform certain things by a given day in October, that power is to be exercised by a new Governor, whom we are going to send out: a man without experience in the affairs of Jamaica is to have the power of deciding the fate of the Assembly. By making it possible to hold over them a coercive threat, we make it impossible for them to execute their functions, effectively. If we wish the Legislature of Jamaica to be continued, surely we also desire that it should be useful. Suppose it yielded to our menace; what authority would it have in the island? Would it not be said, both by whites and blacks, "True, you have saved yourselves from sudden extinction; but why? Was it for the welfare of the negro population? or for the good of the people at large? No; but you did thus under a coercive menace, and you have saved the rights of the people by yielding to fear." After that, how can we hope that the House of Assembly could be useful to their constituents? We are, in fact, placing the island in a worse condition than it was in before. The Legislature will be preserved, it is true; but it will be discredited, in consequence of yielding to a menace. What are the proposed conditions? They are not clearly intelligible to all; they are conditions sub modo; there are certain laws which the House of Assembly is to pass within six weeks or two months; but it is not to pass them absolutely; — a discretion is to be reserved to the House of Assembly to determine this important fact, — whether or not the circumstances of the Island of Jamaica render the application of the Orders in Council expedient. What a wide distinction is here! Suppose they entertain a doubt — a bonâ fide doubt, — and suppose the Governor and council differ from them upon a matter of detail, in respect to which the House of Assembly entertain such bonâ fide doubt, — for let it be observed, they are at liberty to consider whether the Orders in Council are suitable to the local circumstances of the island, or not. Suppose a difference of opinion were to arise; it would then be a grave question for the Imperial Parliament to determine whether or not the decision of the House of Assembly was justified by the circumstances. But, by this Bill, it will be left to the Governor and council to determine this grave point; they will have the power, not only to pass the ordinance, but they will place the Government in this embarrassing position, — the House of Assembly, having a bonâ fide doubt as to the practicable and expedient application of any of the Orders in Council to the local circumstances of the island, the Governor and council may decide that the Assembly shall be extinguished. Will you support the Governor and council in that decision? Now, I would ask, is it fit that great doubts which may arise, should be resolved by the Imperial Parliament in February next, or by the local authority appointed by the Crown on the 15th of October? No, not on the 15th of October, — for they are to have fourteen days more to pass these laws. That is the option given them, with an express injunction to consider the adaptation of these laws to the local circumstances of the island. If they are found to be refractory, — if they refuse to meet, — if they decline to resume their functions at all, — and if clear evidence shall be furnished that they will not perform their duties, — that will be an occasion grave enough for calling the Imperial Parliament together to determine what course should be pursued. By the course now pursued, we are not legislating wisely for Jamaica. This piece of paper, which I hold in my hand, is a plaster for the wounded honour of the Government; and it covers the wound very ineffectually. You have our assurance — we have convinced you — that we are not acting in concert with the agent of Jamaica, — that we are not acting in the spirit of partisanship ——

[Cries of "Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial benches.]

— certainly not in a spirit of Jamaica partisanship; that must be apparent to the Noble Lord himself. We have assured you of our readiness to consider this grave question, — whether, if circumstances of difficulty arise, it will be fitting, or not, to determine to suspend the functions of the House of Assembly of Jamaica? But, from the most positive conviction of the truth and force of what I am saying, I entreat you not to give this advantage to the local Legislature. I entreat that you will not, after the instances and examples you have, yourselves, afforded of the difficulty of deciding great questions in six years, impose on another Legislature, which have not yet had their attention drawn to these things, the necessity of passing, in six weeks, important measures, by holding out to them this condition, — that, unless they obey, their functions shall cease.

[Renewed cries of "Divide, divide!"]
